Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 19 January 1987]: Thirteen breakfast presentations were held in 1986 to increase awareness of the employment, enterprise and training measures offered by my Department and the Manpower Services Commission and particularly to reach local employers whose participation is crucial to the success of many of the programmes. Invitations to the breakfasts were sent to some 13,643 people in all. The location of the breakfasts and the numbers invited are listed below by Department of Employment region:

Region	Locations	Number invited
Midlands	Leicester, Birmingham, Droitwich	2,888
South West	Bristol, Bournemouth	2,613
Yorks and Humberside	Leeds	804
North West	Carlisle, Chester, Manchester, Burnley	4,355
South East	Maidstone, Brighton	2,481
Scotland	Edinburgh	502
		13,643

We intend to hold breakfast presentations in the following towns and cities in the early part of 1987.

Region	Locations
Yorks and Humberside	York
South East	London
Eastern	Cambridge
Scotland	Glasgow, Ayr
Northern	Middlesbrough, Newcastle

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Paymaster General how many people entered the youth training scheme in Hyndburn and north-east Lancashire in 1985; what was the placement percentage; and how many people completed the scheme.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 19 January 1987]: Between April 1985 and March 1986 a total of 1,145 young people entered YTS in Hyndburn and a total of 1,190 entered in the rest of north-east Lancashire.

The Manpower Services Commission follow-up survey of YTS leavers shows that of those who left YTS schemes in Hyndburn between April 1985 and March 1986, 68 per cent. were in work some three months after leaving and 78 per cent. were either in work or in further education/training. The comparable figures for the rest of north-east Lancashire are 66 per cent. in work and 77 per cent. either in work or in further education/training.

From April 1985 until March 1986 a total of 469 young people completed YTS schemes in Hyndburn and 536 completed in the rest of north-east Lancashire.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisons (Smoke-free Cells)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the policy of expecting prison governors to treat applications from prisoners for smoke-free cells was introduced; how it was first communicated to governors; when it was last confirmed to governors as policy; and how this policy is made known to prisoners.

Mr. Mellor: As I indicated in my reply of 18 December 1986 to a previous question from the hon. Member, guidance to governors and medical officers designed to extend prisoners' opportunities to enjoy a smoke-free environment is being prepared. In that context, governors will be encouraged to give favourable consideration to requests to be located in a smoke-free cell where such a course is judged to be practicable in the circumstances of the case and having regard to local conditions at the time. They will also be asked to ensure that prisoners are made aware of the possibility of a smoke-free location being arranged if it is requested.

Birmingham Pub Bombings

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) on 18 December 1986, Official Report, column 1336, he will give a detailed and referenced account of his Department's attempts to obtain from Dr. Frank Skuse details of the methods used by him in the Griess tests that he conducted on the men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings.

Mr. Mellor: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has anything to add to his explanation of Dr. Frank Skuse's early retirement in his answer of 18 December, Official Report, column 1334.

Mr. Mellor: I regret that the answer I gave on 18 December to a supplementary question from the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Miss Maynard) was not entirely accurate. The position is as explained in my letter of 23 December to the hon. Member for Brightside and a copy of that letter was placed in the Library.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of west midlands as to the circumstances in which former Detective Sergeant Brian Morton left the West Midlands police.

Mr. Mellor: No.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in the course of his investigations into the allegations contained in an affadavit by Tom Clarke handed to him on 1 December 1986, he or any of his officials have interviewed (i) Sergeant Dennis Holt, (ii) Detective Constable Jenning, and (iii) Police Constable William Coffey.

Mr. Mellor: No, but I refer the hon. Member to the statement by my right hon. Friend this afternoon in which he said that the Devon and Cornwall constabulary would be investigating Mr. Clarke's allegations.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what occasions he or any of his officials interviewed (a) Police Constable George Cole, (b) Detective Sergeant Alan Watson, (c) Detective Sergeant Michael French, (d) Detective Sergeant James Kelly, (e) former Detective Inspector John Moore or (f) former Detective Superintendent George Reade during his inquiry into the case of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings.

Mr. Mellor: None.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will list what representations he has received since 1 December 1986 concerning the case of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings.

Mr. Mellor: Since 1 December 1986 we have received about 70 letters, including some 25 from right hon. and hon. Members forwarding letters from their constituents expressing concern about the safety of the convictions of these six men.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which police force he asked to investigate the claim in Chris Mullin's book, "Error of Judgement", on the Birmingham pub bombings that the men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings were not responsible for the bombings.

Mr. Mellor: We sought comments from the west Midlands police on Mr. Mullin's claim that four other men were responsible for the bombings, but did not consider that this claim merited a formal investigation.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which police force he asked to investigate the allegations made against the West Midlands police force by Mr. Tom Clarke in an affidavit delivered to him on 1 December 1986.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to the statement my right hon. Friend made today.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps have been taken, if any, to interview (a) Prison Officer Gordon Willingham, (b) Prison Officer Brian Sharp and (c) Prison Officer Patrick Murtagh regarding injuries on the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings at the time of their admission to Her Majesty's prison Winson Green on 25 November 1975.

Mr. Mellor: None in the course of the recent review of the case.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what account has been taken of the unsigned statements of the three prison officers concerning injuries on the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings at the time of their admission to Her Majesty's prison Winson Green on 25 November 1975, which were supplied in October 1985 to the Home Secretary by the hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) in his re-examination of the convictions.

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend sent me unsigned statements by six prison officers. We took them fully into account in our review of the case.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to produce the playing cards taken at the time of their arrest from five of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings, to assist in the re-examination of the forensic evidence.

Mr. Mellor: The disposal of the property of persons later convicted is a matter for the chief constable of the force concerned. Now that the case has been referred to the Court of Appeal, it will be open to the men to ask the court to exercise its power to order the production of anything connected with the proceedings. The playing cards are not in the possession or control of the Home Office, but we shall of course be glad to assist, if we can, in ensuring that they are produced if the court so wishes.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if any action has been taken concerning the former director of the Home Office forensic laboratory at Chorley concerning the provision of allegedly incorrect information regarding the Griess test to Granada television.

Mr. Mellor: The officer concerned has since retired from the public service. According to his own account of the matter, the information which he supplied was based on details given to him by Dr. Skuse. As the hon. Member will know from my right hon. Friend's statement today, the case to which this question relates is being referred to the Court of Appeal.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will place in the Library a copy of the guidance note on the Griess test written by Dr. Frank Skuse referred to in his reply to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Miss Maynard) on 18 December 1986, Official Report, column 1334.

Mr. Mellor: We do not think that this would be appropriate. The note contains information which could be of value to terrorists or others who make unlawful use of explosives.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the precise date of the guidance note on the Griess test written by Dr. Frank Skuse which he refers to in his reply to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Miss Maynard) on 18 December 1986, Official Report, column 1334.

Mr. Mellor: It is undated, but was circulated for a meeting which took place on 14 February 1975.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the percentage strength solution of caustic soda recommended for Griess explosives tests in the methods manual of the Home Office forensic science laboratory at (a) Wetherby, (b) Huntingdon, (c) Chorley, (d) Chepstow, (e) Birmingham and (f) Aldermaston, in the first year after 1974 that each such manual was compiled; and whether there has been any change in those recommended percentages in any year since.

Mr. Mellor: The Chorley laboratory methods manual was written in 1976 and prescribed the use of 0·1 per cent. caustic soda/Griess reagent for the presumptive testing of suspected explosives traces. In 1986 the manual was amended to exclude the use of this procedure, thus formalising a situation which had existed since 1981.

The methods manuals of the other Home Office laboratories contain no reference to the use of this technique for the presumptive testing of explosives traces.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make available a list of the exhibits produced at the trial of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings.

Mr. Mellor: A list of exhibits is among papers being returned to the Court of Appeal. It will be open to the defendants or their representatives to apply to the court for access to papers.

Prison Visits

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he last visited Her Majesty's prison Long Lartin; and for what purpose;

(2) when he last visited Her Majesty's prison Gartree; and for what purpose;

(3) when he last visited Her Majesty's prison Wakefield; and for what purpose;

(4) when he last visited Her Majesty's prison Wormwood Scrubs; and for what purpose.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend visited Wormwood Scrubs prison on 1 November 1985 as part of a programme of visits drawn up to enable him to see at first hand the work of the prison service in all types of penal establishment. He went again for its carol service last Christmas.

He has not yet visited Gartree, Long Lartin and Wakefield prisons.

Leeds-Bradford Airport

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to make an announcement about the possible designation of Leeds-Bradford airport as a port of entry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: The review of the Immigration (Ports of Entry) Order has been completed and my right hon. Friend hopes to announce his decision shortly.

Tottenham Riots (Police Costs)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the legal costs to date incurred by the Metropolitan police in pursuance of cases arising from the Tottenham riots.

Mr. Douglass Hogg: No. I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Licensing Hours (Extensions)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, in respect of each bench of licensing magistrates sitting in Cambridgeshire, Suffolk, Norfolk and Lincolnshire, the number of applications received for extensions of licensing hours and the percentage granted in respect of the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Waddington: The only information collected centrally about extensions of licensing houses, which can be obtained under various provisions, relates to grants of special hours certificates and is given in the table.

Special hours certificates granted in Cambridgeshire, Lincolnshire, Norfolk and Suffolk in respect of on-licensed premises and registered clubs, July 1985-June 1986.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether French police will travel on trains using the proposed Channel fixed link and whether they will disembark in all cases at Ashford.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The arrangements for policing the tunnel system are still under discussion between the British and French Governments.

Bus Lanes

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many convictions there have been relating to unauthorised vehicles in bus lanes in London for the last 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 24 November 1986 at column 50.

New Prison, Wrexham

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is prepared to consider, for the new prison, sites in addition to the one at present under examination at Wrexham, if any were found to be available and generally acceptable.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 15 January 1987, c. 108]: Yes. Following consultations with Wrexham Maelor borough council on 8 December the prison department is awaiting details of possible alternative sites which will be considered in the light of the general requirements for sites for new prison construction.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will consider plans for building a smaller prison at Wrexham than at present suggested.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 15 January 1987, c. 108]: The final size of the prison for which planning clearance will be sought in due course will depend on the outcome of the detailed feasibility study which is being undertaken by the Property Services Agency.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, on what days he first informed Wrexham Maelor borough council and Clwyd county council of his intention to build a category C closed prison for about 600 inmates at Wrexham.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 15 January 1987, c. 252]: The attention of the prison department was first drawn to the possible suitability of the site for a prison project by Clwyd county council in 1984. After initial exchanges of correspondence on the matter and a site visit, a meeting to discuss outline proposals was held with the chief executive and other officers of Clwyd county council on 27 March 1986, at which the chief planning officer of Wrexham Maelor borough council was present. I understand that prior to that meeting there had been some liaison between the county and borough councils about the proposed project. Formal negotiations with Wrexham Maelor borough council, under the provisions of Department of the Environment circular 18/84, were commenced on 8 December 1986.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what permanent new employment he expects to be created as a result of his plans to build a new prison at Wrexham; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 15 January 1987, c.252]: About 300 permanent new jobs would be created in the new prison.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Retirement Pensioners

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much it costs to maintain the welfare of retirement pensioners by wardens in the constituency of Newry and Armagh;

(2) how many retirement pensioners in Northern Ireland are presently living in warden-controlled dwellings in the constituency of Newry and Armagh.

Mr. Viggers: Information is not held centrally in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many retirement pensioners are presently residing in retirement homes paid for by the Department of Health and Social Services in the constituency of Newry and Armagh.

Mr. Viggers: The information is not available in the form requested. However, at 31 December 1985 (the latest date for which figures are available) the number of retirement pensioners accommodated in statutory old people's homes provided in the Southern Health and Social Services Board area was as follows:

	Number
Newry and Mourne Unit of Management	117
Armagh and Dungannon Unit of Management	170

Warden-controlled Areas

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he intends phasing out the present system of warden-controlled areas.

Mr. Viggers: This is a matter for each Health and Social Services Board.

Incontinence

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to ensure that resources are available to ensure that every person suffering from, or suspected as suffering from, incontinence, receives a medical and nursing assessment; what information he has about variations from one part of the country to another in this regard; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: Medical and nursing assessments are already available in all Health and Social Services Board areas for patients suffering from incontinence. It is a matter for Health and Social Services Board to determine how their available resources should be allocated in the light of local needs and circumstances.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what evaluations have been made on the quality of the goods used in the management of incontinence; what evaluation units have been set up within his Department; what are proposed in assessing the quality of goods; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: While no evaluations have been made by the Department of Health and Social Services it recently brought to the attention of the Health and Social Services Boards the results of a study conducted at St. Pancras Hospital from April 1983 to April 1985. It included clinical trials, technical assessments and review of laboratory testing of incontinence garments.

It is for the Health and Social Services Boards to assess and decide the best and most cost-effective means of providing these garments and I am satisfied that they are doing so in the light of local needs and circumstances.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what support his Department is giving to the research into uro-dynamic investigation; if he will provide funds for the establishment of regional uro-dynamic investigation units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: The Department of Health and Social Services is not at present directly funding any research projects into uro-dynamic investigation. Any applications received for funding in this field would be considered on their merits along with other Health and Social Services projects.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what advice his Department gives to general practitioners and hospital authorities regarding the treatment of incontinence caused by constipation; what investigations his Department has done on the subject of bowel management and faecal impaction; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: None. It would be inappropriate for the Department to give specific advice or guidance on all the detailed aspects of incontinence or to carry out investigations into such clinical problems. It is a matter for staff to decide on the basis of their own professional judgment how to advise and treat their patients.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if his Department will provide courses for general practitioners to assist them to recognise overflow incontinence in the case of severely constipated patients who are referred to geriatric hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend on 13 January 1987 [Official Report, Vol. 108, col. 152].

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland who is responsible for co-ordinating and advising on the problems of incontinence and its treatment in all forms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: Responsibility for co-ordinating and advising on the problems of incontinence, its treatment and the provision of services rests with Health and Social Services Boards in conjunction with professional medical and nursing bodies.

Bowel Problems

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what guidelines his Department gives with regard to the management of bowel problems by non-skilled and untrained assistants in geriatric units and residential homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: General guidance is given in the handbook "Improving Geriatric Care in Hospital" and the memorandum of guidance "Residential Homes for the Elderly—Arrangements for Health Care". However, the issue of detailed operational guidelines for the management of bowel problems is a matter for each Health and Social Services Board.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if his Department will promote a research programme and study of the number of patients in psychiatric hospitals who are suffering from mental confusion caused by faecal impaction; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: No. The number of patients who suffer from mental confusion caused by faecal impaction is extremely small and does not justify a research programme.

Forestry

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will make a statement on arrangements to ensure the conservation of broadleaved woodlands and on felling licence regulations;

(2) what safeguards exist to protect broadleaved and ancient semi-natural woodlands from felling or conversion to coniferous woodland or agricultural land.

Mr. Viggers: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Health and Social Services (Expenditure)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give (a) the total gross expenditure on health services, (b) total expenditure on the hospital and community health service, (c) revenue expenditure on the hospital and community health service, (d) capital expenditure on the hospital and community health service, (e) expenditure on family practitioner services, (f) expenditure on centrally-funded services and (g) expenditure on personal social services for each year since 1974-75 in cash terms and adjusted by the gross domestic product deflator and the relevant indexes of pay and prices.

Mr. Viggers [pursuant to his reply, 19 January 1987]: The information is set out in the tables.

[1] Excludes Departmental Administration

Maghaberry Prison

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what are the current male and female populations of Maghaberry prison in Northern Ireland; and what is the certified normal accommodation;

(2) whether there are any plans to allocate additional prisoners to Maghaberry prison during 1987; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 16 January 1986]: There are separate prisons for males and females at Maghaberry. The certified normal accommodation for the male prison is 432 and is 56 for the female prison.

On 14 January 1987 the population of the male prison was 11 and of the female prison was 31. The female prison contains the whole remand and sentenced female prison population in Northern Ireland; we intend to increase the prisoner population of the male prison throughout 1987.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Whisky Industry

Mr. Canavan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what subjects he discussed at his last meeting with representatives of the Scotch whisky industry.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I met representatives of the industry at the beginning of December. Among the subjects discussed were the alcoholic strength at which whisky is being marketed in the EC and the difficult competitive position for Scotch whisky in the Japanese market.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) whether, within the environmentally sensitive areas, the payments announced on 18 December 1986 will be available to voluntary conservation bodies for the management of land purchased with the help of grand aid from statutory conservation bodies;

(2) if, within environmentally sensitive areas, the payments announced on 18 December 1986 will be available to all landowners managing land for agricultural purposes, including voluntary conservation bodies.

Mr. Donald Thompson [pursuant to his reply, 19 January 1987]: Voluntary conservation bodies or their tenants are entitled to apply for payment under the environmentally sensitive areas arrangements. Each such application will be considered individually. Where a body, landowner or other individual has already agreed to protect the environmental value of the land and has received public funds for that purpose, there could in some cases be double payment if an environmentally sensitive area agreement were offered in addition. Normal principles of Government accounting on the proper use of public funds would prevent the Ministry from accepting applications in such cases.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers (Pay and Conditions)

9. Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what criteria he uses to decide whether to publish the reports of the new Advisory Committee on Teachers Pay and Conditions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: All reports of the advisory committee on teachers' pay and conditions would be published.

20. Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he next proposes to meet representatives of the teachers unions to discuss pay and conditions.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I am meeting representatives of the National Union of Teachers tomorrow. I am sure that the issue of teachers' pay and conditions of service will be raised. I am very willing to conduct further meetings with any of the teacher unions whenever they wish to see me.

13. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the association of local education authorities to discuss teachers' pay and conditions.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I met the leader of the local authority employers last Thursday to discuss teachers' pay and conditions and related issues.

28. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on teachers' appraisal.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: At my invitation, six local education authorities have formed a consortium to pilot teacher appraisal in their schools. They are:

Croydon
Cumbria
Newcastle
Salford
Somerset
Suffolk

The project is being funded through the education support grant arrangements and a steering group has been established involving representatives of the Secretary of State, local education authorities and the teachers' unions.

32. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the teachers' unions and associations to discuss teachers' pay and conditions.

44. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the teachers' unions and associations to discuss teachers' pay and conditions.

38. Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the teachers' unions and associations to discuss teachers' pay and conditions.

41. Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the teachers' unions and associations to discuss teachers' pay and conditions.

Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the teachers' unions and associations to discuss teachers' pay and conditions.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The dates of my recent meetings with the teachers' unions to discuss pay and conditions are:

18 December 1986 — National Association of Head Teachers.
19 December 1986—Secondary Heads Association.
6 January 1987—Professional Association of Teachers.
12 January 1987 — National Association of Teachers/ Union of Women Teachers.

I am meeting the National Union of Teachers tomorrow.

36. Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received on his proposals to set up an advisory committee on teachers' pay and conditions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have received a small number of representations on the proposal to set up an Advisory Committee on teachers' pay and conditions, including representations from the local authority associations and teachers' unions.

39. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement on the position regarding teachers' pay and conditions.

42. Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the current position regarding negotiations with the teachers' unions on pay and conditions.

74. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement on the teachers' pay negotiations.

89. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement on the pay and conditions of teachers.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer the hon. Members to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts).

50. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received regarding teachers' pay.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Since my statement on 30 October 1986, I have received some 200 letters from hon. Members about teachers' pay and conditions and around 1,600 letters from members of the public, including representatives of the local education authorities, teachers' unions and parents.

53. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the association of the local education authorities to discuss teachers' pay and conditions.

59. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the association of the local education authorities to discuss teachers' pay and conditions.

76. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the associations of the local education authorities to discuss teachers' pay and conditions.

83. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the association of the local education authorities to discuss teachers' pay and conditions.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer the hon. Members to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike).

92. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent discussions he has had with local education authorities regarding matters affecting teacher discipline and responsibilities.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has had a number of recent meetings with representatives of the local education authorities to discuss the pay and conditions of school teachers. He has had no discussions on the specific subject of teacher discipline.

Primary Schools (Expenditure)

10. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much was spent per pupil in primary schools in England in 1978 and in the most recent year for which figures are available, in real terms; and what are the comparable figures for primary schools in Staffordshire.

Mr. Dunn: Local educational authorities in England spent an average of £650 per primary pupil in 1978-79 and £760 in 1984-85. The comparable figures for Staffordshire are £665 and £770. The cash figures for 1978-79 have been repriced to 1984-85 real terms using the gross domestic product deflator.

Replan

11. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement concerning the future of Replan after 1988.

Mr. Dunn: Having reviewed the progress made by Replan during the past year, my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Education and Science and for Wales have agreed that the programme's duration should be extended to 31 December 1989.

School Meals

14. Mr. Garrett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the provision of resources for school meals.

Mr. Dunn: The Government's forecast of expenditure on school meals next year is for a modest reduction of present levels of spending. However, we continue to regard school meals as one of the services where many LEAs could achieve substantial savings in their net costs by introducing more efficient methods of working. Grant-related expenditure has been assessed on that basis.

23. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what figures he has on the number of staff employed in the supervision of school meals.

Mr. Dunn: Figures for midday supervision will be available in the spring when the results of the October 1986 school meals census are known.

37. Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make it his policy to introduce national nutritional standards for school meals.

Mr. Dunn: No. It is for local education authorities to decide what standards and quantities of food should be made available and for parents to decide what their children should eat.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will now estimate the cost for the United Kingdom as a whole in 1985-86 of school meals provided free of charge for (a) pupils and (b) staff.

Mr. Dunn: It was not practicable to hold a school meals census in October 1985 in England in view of the disruption to the service caused by the teachers' dispute. The Department therefore does not have the information to calculate the proportions of school meals expenditure attributable to free meals for pupils and staff. The school meals service in the rest of the United Kingdom is the responsibility of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland.

Technical Research

16. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the current facilities for technical research.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Facilities for research are being continually improved. Since 1979 university equipment grants have increased by 24 per cent. and the Science Budget by 11 per cent., compared with general levels of inflation.

Special Education

17. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will increase resources to implement the provisions on special education in the Education Act 1981.

Mr. Dunn: The Government's plans for local authority spending in 1987-88, announced last November, represent a cash increase of 18·8 per cent. over the 1986-87 plans. This will enable local education authorities to increase their spending on areas which they consider have priority, including special education.

58. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will increase resources to implement the provisions on special education in the Education Act 1981.

Mr. Dunn: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd).

School Buildings

18. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the provision of resources for the repair and maintenance of school buildings.

61. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the level of resources available for the repair and maintenance of school buildings.

87. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the provision of resources for the repair and maintenance of school buildings.

88. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the current level of resources for the repair and maintenance of school buildings.

Mr. Dunn: If local education authorities budget sensibly, the Government's plans for local authority current expenditure on education will permit a 14 per cent. increase in real terms in spending on the repair and maintenance of school buildings in 1987-88, compared with actual spending in 1984-85.

79. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his estimate of the cost required to bring all school buildings to a satisfactory condition; and what steps he is taking to ensure that greater cost is not being deferred to some future date because of present lack of maintenance.

Mr. Dunn: It is not possible to make such an estimate at present. Once analysis of them is complete, however, the returns provided by LEAs in England for the Department's sample survey of school building improvement needs should enable us to do so in respect of county and controlled schools. The Government's plans for local authority recurrent expenditure on education in 1987-88 allow for a 14 per cent. increase in real terms over authorities' actual expenditure in 1984-85 on the repair and maintenance of school buildings, provided authorities budget sensibly.

City Technology Colleges

19. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement on progress on plans for the city technology colleges.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress he has made on the establishment of city technology colleges.

78. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress he has made towards establishing city technology colleges.

56. Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress he has made towards the establishment of city technology colleges.

82. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress he has made towards establishing city technology colleges.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer my hon. Friend and the hon. Members to the answer which I gave earlier today to the hon. Members for Ryedale (Mrs Shields) and Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud).

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will report on the progress of his initiatives to improve standards of education in inner cities.

Mr. Dunn: The policy of my right hon. Friend is to improve standards of education in all schools, including those in inner cities where special assistance is given through the urban programme, section 11 grant, the inner cities, initiative and education support grants. The city technology college initiative will also contribute to an improvement in the standards of education in inner cities.

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many inquiries he has so far received from individuals or groups interested in establishing city technology colleges.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Several hundred organisations and individuals, many expressing an interest in sponsorship or co-sponsorship of a city technology college have written to the Department since the invitation was issued in mid-October 1986.

86. Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he now expects the first city technology college to come into operation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have set September 1988 as the target date for the opening of the first city technology college. It is too soon to say whether this can be achieved.

Schools (Resources and Equipment)

21. Mr. Torney asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the teachers' unions and associations to discuss the level of resources and equipment available to classroom teachers.

Mr. Dunn: Over the past months my right hon. Friend has had meetings with several of the teachers' unions and associations at their request to discuss topics they have raised, including resources.

Polytechnics

22. Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the Committee of Directors of Polytechnics to discuss the provision of resources for polytechnics.

27. Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the Committee of Directors of Polytechnics to discuss the provision of resources for polytechnics.

52. Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the Committee of Directors of Polytechnics to discuss the provision of resources for polytechnics.

73. Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the Committee of Directors of Polytechnics to discuss the provision of resources for polytechnics.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I last met the Committee of Directors of Polytechnics on 3 October 1986 when the provision of resources was among the subjects discussed.

Student Grants

24. Mr. Mark Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the National Union of Students to discuss student financial support.

33. Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the National Union of Students to discuss student financial support.

45. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the National Union of Students to discuss student financial support.

69. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the National Union of Students to discuss student financial support.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer hon. Members to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Members for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) and for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd).

Primary and Secondary Schools (Books)

25. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the provision of resources for the purchasing of books in primary and secondary schools.

63. Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the provision of books in primary and secondary schools.

90. Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the provision of resources for the purchasing of books in primary and secondary schools.

Mr. Dunn: I refer the hon. Members to my reply earlier today to the hon. Members for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) and for Leigh (Mr. Cunliffe).

Higher Education (Non-academic Pay)

26. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the level of non-academic pay in higher education.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Government are not involved in the pay negotiations for this group of staff. It is for universities and local education authorities to reach agreement on pay levels which they can afford having regard to recruitment, retention and motivation.

Further Education (MSC)

29. Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission to discuss the involvement of the commission in further education.

47. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission to discuss the involvement of the commission in further education.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has regular meetings with the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission to discuss its work. Their last meeting took place on 5 November 1986.

Brain Drain

30. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the Association of University Teachers to discuss the number of academics who have emigrated in the past years.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend last met the AUT on 18 December to discuss a range of matters touching upon university pay.

Higher Education (Pay)

31. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the Association of University Teachers and the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education to discuss the level of academic pay in higher education.

54. Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the Association of University Teachers and the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education to discuss the level of academic pay in higher education.

60. Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the Association of University Teachers and the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education to discuss the level of academic pay in higher education.

64. Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the Association of University Teachers to discuss the level of academic pay in higher education.

75. Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education to discuss the level of academic pay in higher education.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I last met representatives of the Association of University Teachers on 18 December 1986 and the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education on 15 October 1986.

Mathematics and Physics Teachers

34. Mr. McLoughlin asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any proposals to deal with the shortage of mathematics and physics teachers in some schools.

Mr. Dunn: A number of measures have been taken to improve the supply of mathematics and physics teachers. These include the introduction of a £1,200 bursary scheme for trainee teachers, development funding for training courses designed to tap new sources of recruitment, and substantial funding in support of in-service training. A new unit to publicise career opportunities in teaching will be operational shortly. We are working with the education service and with industry on further possible initiatives.

University of Wales

35. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received concerning the funding of the University of Wales.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have received about 70 representations from hon. Members, staff and students about the funding of the constituent colleges of the University of Wales. I will be meeting the Pro-Chancellor and other representatives of the University on 29 January.

Higher Education

40. Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy on the future numbers of students entering higher education.

Mr. Dunn: The Government's policy is that places should be available for all who have the intellectual competence, maturity and motivation to benefit from higher education and who wish to do so. Revised projections of demand for higher education were published in November; a copy is in the Library.

67. Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any proposals to increase the resources available to higher education.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I announced on 6 November that recurrent grant for universities in Great Britain would be £95 million higher in 1987-88 than in the current year and that university equipment grant would increase by £6·5 million. For public sector higher education in England I announced on 19 December that the advanced further education pool would increase by £55·5 million in 1987-88 and that grants to voluntary colleges would rise by £3·5 million. Related increases in the Government's expenditure plans for 1988-89 and 1989-90 were included in Cmnd. 56 published last week..

Sex Education

46. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he proposes to bring into effect section 46 of the Education Act 1986, relating to sex education in schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Section 46 of the Education (No. 2) Act 1986 came into force on 7 January 1987.

Assisted Places Scheme

48. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received about the number of places available in Leicester schools under the assisted places scheme.

Mr. Dunn: None

Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the level of parental contributions to the fees of pupils in the assisted places scheme in 1987-88.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Subject to the usual consultations and to parliamentary approval, the parental contribution scales will be adjusted upwards for the school year 1987-88 as follows:

Part of relevant income to which specified percentage applies	One assisted pupil	Each of two assisted pupils	Each of three assisted pupils per cent.	per cent.	per cent.
That part which exceeds £6,806 but does not exceed £7,400	9	6·75	5·25
That part (if any) which exceeds £7,400 but does not exceed £8,005	12	9	7
That part (if any) which exceeds £8,005 but does not exceed £9,204	15	11·25	8·75
That part (if any) which exceeds £9,204 but does not exceed £11,049	21	15·75	12·25
That part (if any) which exceeds £11,049 but does not exceed £13,458	24	18	14
That part (if any) which exceeds £13,458	33	24·75	19·25

Education Quality

49. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what further measures he will introduce to improve the quality of education in England and Wales.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: When the wide range of Government measures already in train or announced has been fully implemented, the impact on the quality of education will be substantial. I shall where appropriate propose further measures in the light of the developments in hand.

Vocational Education

51. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he is taking to encourage vocational education in schools.

Mr. Dunn: The Government believe that an important objective for the school curriculum is that it should become increasingly practical and relevant to the demands of adult and working life. We are pursuing a number of policies to this end, including the technical and vocational education initiative which is being extended later this year to be available to 14-18 year olds in all maintained schools and colleges.

Secondary Schools

55. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the associations of local education authorities to discuss the problem of the reorganisation of secondary schools.

Mr. Dunn: The issue of school rationalisation and the scope it provides for the removal of surplus places and for current expenditure savings, was discussed at a meeting between the associations and my right hon. Friend on 29 September 1986 to discuss the Government's proposals for local authority current expenditure in 1987-88.

Universities (Funding)

43. Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals to discuss the provision of resources for universities.

57. Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals to discuss the provision of resources for universities.

62. Mr. Blair asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals to discuss the provision of resources for universities.

65. Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals to discuss the provision of resources for universities.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I met representatives of the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals on 9 September to discuss the provision of resources for universities generally and on 17 December to discuss the resources available for the pay of academic staff. I also addressed the CVCP's anual conference on 23 September.

Head Teachers and Governors

66. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his proposals to give greater powers to head teachers and boards of governors.

Mr. Dunn: The Government firmly believe that more effective education can be secured by putting more power and responsibilities in the hands of individual schools. This is being achieved under the Education (No. 2) Act 1986 which substantially increases the role of governing bodies and head teachers.

Further Education (Funding)

68. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education to discuss the level of resources in further education.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I last met NATFHE on 15 October 1986. My hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) met representatives of the Association on 3 December 1986.

Universities (Funding)

81. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his latest estimate of the amount of funds which British universities have attracted in the current financial year from commercial sponsors for research and development projects; what was the comparable figure in 1978-79; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: In 1984-85, the most recent year for which comprehensive figures are available, universities received £47 million in research grants and contracts from United Kingdom industry. This compares with an equivalent income of £23 million in 1981-82, the first year this information was collected. The Government welcome this increase but note that research income from industry still amounts to only just over 2 per cent. of total university income and thus believe there is scope for further significant increases.

Grammar Schools

70. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of secondary schoolchildren attend grammar schools; and what percentage of A-level passes in grades A to C are secured by pupils from grammar schools.

Mr. Dunn: In January 1986, 3 per cent. of pupils in maintained secondary schools (excluding middle deemed secondary) in England were attending grammar schools. Grammar school leavers in the academic year 1984-85 held 14·8 per cent. of the A-level passes at grades A-C obtained by leavers from all maintained schools.

Aberdeen University

71. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from staff and students at Aberdeen university regarding the future structure of academic terms.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has received four letters from staff and students at Aberdeen university about proposals being considered there for possible changes in the structure and length of degree courses.

School Governing Bodies

77. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he plans to take against those local education authorities which ignore the wishes of their school governing bodies.

Mr. Dunn: Generally, the position of governing bodies will be strengthened by the Education (No. 2) Act 1986 which clarifies the relative powers and responsibilities of those involved in running individual schools. My right hon. Friend retains the power under sections 68 and 99 of the Education Act 1944 to intervene in cases where a local education authority has manifestly abused its powers or neglected its duties.

Religious Education

80. Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he takes to monitor compliance by schools with the provisions of the Education Act 1944 about religious education.

Mr. Dunn: We look to schools themselves and their local education authorities to observe the requirements which the Act lays on them. Where complaints are made to my right hon. Friend that these requirements are not being met in a particular school they are fully and carefully investigated. Very few such complaints are made each year.

Scottish Universities (UGC Grants)

91. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from Scottish universities about the future allocation of grants fom the University Grants Committee.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have received about 55 representations from staff and students at Scottish universities about recurrent grants for 1986-87 and the University Grants Committee's allocations.

Clinical Academic Staff

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in the Official Report information available to him on those universities that have yet to implement the nationally agreed pay award to clinical academic staff.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I am not aware of any university that has not implemented the increases agreed by the Clinical Academic Staff Salaries Committee with effect from 1 July 1986.

Universities and Polytechnics

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to assess expenditure in universities and polytechnics on computer studies and other information technology related courses separately from mathematics and other non-related courses.

Mr. Dunn: The University Grants Committee and the Universities' Statistical Record have recently introduced a separate classification for computer science, but other information technology related courses are covered by broader classifications including electrical and electronic engineering, physical sciences, and business and management studies. Computer studies and other information technology related courses are not separately identified in returns by polytechnics.

University of East Anglia

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received regarding proposals to cut back the school of development studies at the University of East Anglia.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has received 15 representations concerning the University of East Anglia's current discussions about the future funding of its school of development studies.

Central Funding

Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list those courses in the school curriculum which are now centrally funded and were not so funded in June 1979.

Mr. Dunn: The whole of the technical and vocational education initiative and three quarters of the cost of the Lower Attaining Pupils Programme are funded by central Government. Education Support Grants have afforded considerable support to the school curriculum.

Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what courses being taught in maintained schools in Bedfordshire are now centrally funded and were not so funded in June 1979.

Mr. Dunn: Bedfordshire has a pilot project within the technical and vocational education initiative. Education Support Grants are assisting with the cost of employing advisory teachers in mathematics, and with the development of science teaching in primary schools.

University Entrants

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the number of school-leavers entering full-time degree courses at university in 1986 from each education authority; and if he will express these figures as a proportion of the number of students in secondary education in each authority.

Mr. Dunn: Data on leavers from maintained schools are:

Data subject to sampling error and has been averaged over three years to reduce its significance.

Note: LEA's vary in the extent to which post 16 education provision is centred in schools, tertiary or other FE colleges. In this context Richmond, for example, with no school sixth forms, has no leavers intending to pursue university degree courses.

Expenditure

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report a table based on table 3.12 of the public expenditure White Paper Cmnd. 56-II, with all figures converted to 1986-87 prices.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information requested is set out in the table. The figures have been revalued using the GDP (market prices) deflator, which is assumed to rise by 3·75, 3·5 and 3·0 per cent. respectively in the years 1987-88 to 1989-90.

The figures for 1988-89 and 1989-90 in the table below have been calculated by revaluing the unrounded planning figures for those years. All figures in the table have been rounded to the nearest £1 million.

[2] The 1986-87 figures incorporate a provisional distribution by sector of total current spending by local authorities based on their budgets.
[3] From 1981-82 local authority capital expenditure includes provision for the urban programme.
[4] The change in the trend of higher education and student award figures between 1981-82 and 1982-83 reflects the reduction in tuition fees described in Cmnd. 8494.

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on expenditure to be supported by education support grant in 1987-88.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In 1987-88 the Government intends to assist expenditure of £92 million in England through education support grant. My Department will pay grant on that expenditure at 70 per cent.—£64 million of Exchequer grant in all. Every local education authority in England will benefit from the programme.

Within the overall figure of £92 million, over £38 million of expenditure on schemes of midday supervision will be supported, and about £34 million of expenditure on other projects started this year or last. The amount available to start new projects next year will be £20·1 million. This will be spent on 10 activities. Of these, eight have appeared in previous programmes, and two are new types of pilot project this year; to promote social responsibility in young people; to develop the use of the spoken word by pupils aged 5 to 16.

All of the local education authorities in England bid for grant support, and for each of the activities subject to open bidding the total of bids exceeded the total expenditure which could be supported.

The Department will today inform local education authorities of the levels of expenditure which I have approved for all of the activities to be supported in 1987-88, except that relating to information systems for management of further education establishments on which I expect to announce approvals in the early spring.

The table sets out for the nine activities in which new starts are now approved the levels of expenditure to be supported next year and the numbers of authorities for whom I have approved projects.

Royal Greenwich Observatory

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received favouring the relocation of the Royal Greenwich observatory to Edinburgh; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has recently received one such letter. There has been no change in the situation since my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) announced on 13 November at column 2 that the necessary approvals in principle had been given in connection with the Science and Engineering Research Council's proposal to move the Royal Greenwich observatory to Cambridge.

WALES

Incontinence

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take steps to ensure that resources are available to ensure that every person suffering from, or suspected as suffering from, incontinence receives a medical and nursing assessment; what information he has about variations from one part of the country to another in that regard; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: It is for individual authorities to decide for themselves how best to allocate their resources to meet their local needs and circumstances.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what evaluations have been made on the quality of the goods used in the management of incontinence; what evaluation units have been set up within his Department; what are proposed in assessing the quality of goods; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Two evaluations carried out under the DHSS aids assessment programme were reported on in 1982-83. These covered incontinence garments and incontinence aids for handicapped children.

More recently, an evaluation study of incontinence pads and garments was funded by the Government at the department of geriatric medicine in the medical school of university college hospital, London. The report of this study was reported in the health equipment information series (no. 159, October 1986). Further work is being undertaken and will be reported in due course.

I understand that discussions are in progress with a view to establishing an evaluation unit to undertake a programme of assessments of incontinence products.

The need for such assessment is recognised as an important means of achieving the most effective use of the significant resources devoted to this area.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what support his Department is giving to the research into uro-dynamic investigation; if he will provide funds for the estabishment of regional uro-dynamic investigation units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Basic urological research is being supported by the Medical Research Council, which is the main Government-funded agency for medical and biological research in the United Kingdom. Central funds are provided for uro-dynamic investigation within the regional spinal injuries rehabilitation service at Rookwood hospital, Cardiff.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if his Department will provide courses for general practitioners to assist them to recognise overflow incontinence in the case of severely constipated patients who are referred to geriatric hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave him on 13 January at column 156.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales who is responsible for co-ordinating the advising on the problems of incontinence and its treatment in all forms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Arrangements for co-ordinating and advising on the problems of incontinence, its treatment and the provision of services is a matter for individual health and local authorities. Many of them have appointed continence advisers to carry out these functions following advice given by the Welsh Office in 1977 that the management of incontinence should be clearly identified as the responsibility of a designated special nurse. Individuals suffering from incontinence should seek advice on treatment and management of the problem from their general practitioner, district nurse or health visitor.

Bowel Problems

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what advice his Department gives to general practitioners and hospital authorities regarding the treatment of incontinence caused by constipation; what investigations his Department has done on the subject of bowel management and faecal impaction; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what guidelines his Department gives with regard to the management of bowel problems by non-skilled and untrained assistants in geriatric units and residential homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: General guidance on the management of incontinence is given in the handbook of guidelines "Improving Geriatric Care in Hospital" and the memorandum of guidance "Residential Homes for the Elderly—Arrangements for Health Care". Guidance for general practitioners will be included in a training package under development as part of the Government's helping the community to care programme. However, it would not be appropriate to issue specific guidance on all the detailed clinical aspects of incontinence, as it is for clinicians to decide how to treat their patients. In geriatric units, a trained nurse should have the responsibility for planning the care of patients. Tasks undertaken by nursing auxiliaries should be under the direction and observation of the nurse in residential homes. The management of incontinence by care assistants should be under the supervision of trained staff. Advice and guidance on health care should be available from the community nursing services.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if his Department will promote a research programme and study of the number of patients in psychiatric hospitals who are suffering from mental confusion caused by faecal impaction; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The results of research on faecal incontinence are widely available. The treatment of patients in psychiatric hospitals is a matter for the health authorities concerned.

Industrial Aid

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total sum of regional selective grants paid to industry in Wales during each year since 1976.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Payments of regional selective assistance grants made to industry in Wales under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982 in each financial year since 1976-77 are as follows:

1976-77	4
1978-79	30
1979-80	19
1980-81	11
1981-82	9
1982-83	14
1983-84	15
1984-85	19
[1]1986-87	19

Farm Horticulture Development Scheme

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many claims were made in Wales under the farm horticulture development scheme during 1985 and 1986; what were the eligible costs of these claims; and what grant payments were made in relation to them.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information requested is as follows:

Number of claims received	3,047	1,079
Number of claims paid	3,273	1,415
Eligible costs of paid claims	£12,575,174	£6,285,916
Grant paid	£4,932,220	£2,551,582

[1] Figures available to 30 September 1986 only.

The farm and horticulture development scheme closed for new applications for development plans from 30 September 1980.

Farm Capital Grant Scheme

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many claims were made in Wales under the farm capital grant scheme during 1985 and 1986; what were the eligible costs of these claims; and what grant payments were made in relation to them.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: This scheme was closed for new claims after 31 January 1984. In 1985, 12 claims were received in Wales, involving £41,784 eligible costs and grant of £20,928 was paid. There were no payments in 1986.

SCOTLAND

Area Health Boards (Patients)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, further to his answer of 18 December, Official Report, column 659, what information is available centrally on patients awaiting treatment by area health boards.

Mr. John MacKay: A central return is made bi-annually of the number of patients waiting for inpatient treatment in each speciality within each hospital. The information relates to 31 March and 30 September.

Hypothermia

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many deaths have been recorded in the Borders region each year since 1979 which noted hypothermia as the cause of death or as a contributory factor.

Mr. John MacKay: The numbers of deaths in the Borders Region since 1979 showing hypothermia as the underlying cause or as a contributory factor are shown below:

Deaths from hypothermia (any mention) in the Borders Region, 1979 to 1986

Incontinence

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will take steps to ensure that resources are available to ensure that every person suffering from, or suspected of suffering from, incontinence receives a medical and nursing assessment; what information he has about the variations from one part of the country to another in this regard; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: It is for each health board to allocate its resources on the basis of its knowledge of local needs and priorities. Assessment is provided, following referral by the general practitioner, in urological and, increasingly, gynaecological units. Its availability in different areas reflects the different approaches and interests of the clinicians dealing with incontinence.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what evaluations have been made on the quality of the goods used in the management of incontinence; what evaluation units have been set-up within his Department; what are proposed in assessing the quality of goods; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The results of the most recent evaluation of incontinence pads and garments, including clinical trials, technical assessments and a review of laboratory testing, were published in the Health Departments' health equipment information series in October 1986.

Goods used in the management of incontinence are provided to Scottish health boards under contracts or special price arrangements arranged by the Scottish Health Service Common Services Agency (CSA). These goods conform with standards of quality and/or specification established either by the DHSS procurement directorate or by CSA contract adjudication panels.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what advice his Department gives to general practitioners and hospital authorities regarding the treatment of incontinence caused by constipation; what investigations his Department has done on the subject of bowel management and faecal impaction; and if he will make a statement;

(2) who is responsible for co-ordinating and advising on the problems of incontinence and its treatment in all forms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Health boards and local authorities are responsible for co-ordinating and advising on the problems of incontinence and for the provision of services. Detailed clinical advice to individuals is best given by general practitioners and hospital medical and nursing staff. Any soundly-based proposals for financial support for research into aspects of incontinence will be carefully considered.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if his Department will provide courses for general practitioners to assist them to recognise overflow incontinence in the case of severely constipated patients who are referred to geriatric hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: No. I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 13 January 1987 [Official Report, Vol. 108, c. 163].

Uro-dynamic Investigation

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what support his Department is giving to the research into uro-dynamic investigation; if he will provide funds for the establishment of regional uro-dynamic investigation units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The Scottish Home and Health Department is not at present supporting any research project in the specific field of uro-dynamic investigation but is willing to consider support for any soundly based research proposal. There are already a number of specialised urological units throughout Scotland where uro-dynamic investigation is carried out as part of the routine clinical assessment.

Bowel Problems

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidelines his Department gives with regard to the management of bowel problems by non-skilled and untrained assistants in geriatric units and residential homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: It is for each health board to determine guidelines as necessary regarding the management of bowel problems by staff in NHS geriatric units.

In residential homes owned by or registered with the local authority, it is the responsibility of the authority to ensure that satisfactory standards of care are provided in accordance with its statutory responsibility under the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968. The emphasis in such homes is very much on care. In a situation where an element of nursing became necessary, trained nurses from the Community Nursing Service would provide support.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if his Department will provide a research programme and study of the number of patients in psychiatric hospitals who are suffering from mental confusion caused by faecal impaction; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: No. There is no evidence to suggest that primary mental illness is caused by faecal impaction.

Population Statistics (Dundee)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will indicate the number of one-parent families in Dundee in 1981 where the head of the household was unemployed.

Mr. John MacKay: The 1981 census indicates that of the 1,293 economically active adults living alone with children aged under 16, 292 were not in employment. The information is contained in volume 1, table 38 of the 1981 census report for Tayside Region, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will indicate from the 1981 census (a) the total number of households in Dundee and (b) the total number of children under 16 years of age in Dundee.

Mr. John MacKay: The total number of households in Dundee was 67,352 and the total number of children under 16 years of age was 38,164. The information is contained in volume 1, tables H and 8 of the 1981 census report for Tayside Region, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will indicate the number of children in Dundee resident within a one-parent family.

Mr. John MacKay: The 1981 census indicated that households consisting of a lone adult with children under 16 contained 3,621 children under 16. The information is contained in volume 1, table 38 of the 1981 census report for Tayside Region, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will indicate the number of households in Dundee which are one-parent families; and if he will disaggregate the figures to show how many of them are (a) divorced mothers, (b) separated mothers and unmarried mothers, (c) divorced fathers and (d) widowed mothers.

Mr. John MacKay: Information readily available from the 1981 census shows that there were 2,161 households containing one adult with one or more children under 16. Of these adults, 234 were male and 1,927 were female. There are no figures available on the disaggregation requested. The information is contained in volume 1, table 38 of the 1981 census report for Tayside Region, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mortality Statistics (Tayside)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the number of deaths amongst women in Tayside in the latest available year, 1980, and 1976, respectively, from the following cancers: (a) breast, (b) lung, (c) colon, (d) stomach, (e) ovary, (f) pancreas, (g) rectum, (h) cervix, (i) oesophagus, (j) uterus and (k) bladder.

Mr. John MacKay: The information requested is shown in the table below:

Deaths of women from specific cancers, Tayside Health Board, 1976, 1980 and 1985

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the number of deaths amongst women in Tayside health board in the latest available year; and what are the corresponding figures for 1980 and 1976, respectively.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

Deaths of women in Tayside Health Board, 1976, 1980 and 1985

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the net change in the number of unemployed to date in Dundee by district council ward since the present system of unemployment counting came into operation.

Mr. Lang: The change in the number of unemployed claimants in each electoral ward of the City of Dundee district between 6 March 1986 (the date the current method of compiling the unemployment statistics came into operation) and 11 December 1986 (the latest date for which information is available was as shown in the table below. School Clothing (Payments)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what payments have been made by education authorities under section 54 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 to parents of school-age children for the purchase of school clothing for the years 1981 to 1986; and what are the figures for each education authority in that period.

Mr. John MacKay: The information to the latest year available is as follows:

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the expenditure per head of school population for payments under sector 54 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 for each education authority from the years 1981 to 1986 for the purchase of school clothing.

Mr. John MacKay: The information to the latest date available is as follows:

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidance has been issued to social work authorities in Scotland since 1981 on their use of section 12 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 in response to requests for assistance with provision of school clothing from parents of school-age children and in their liaison with education departments on provision designed to ensure that children attend school appropriately and adequately clothed.

Mr. John MacKay: None. Local authorities' powers to provide assistance in cash or in kind under this section are expressly related to situations where they would otherwise be required to take more extensive measures in respect of the child's welfare.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidance has been issued to education authorities on the exercise of their duties under section 54 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980.

Mr. John MacKay: Assistance with clothing under section 54 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 is available only where a pupil is unable to take full advantage of the education offered because of the inadequacy or unsuitability of his clothing. This is a matter for decision by education authorities in the circumstances of individual cases and no central guidance has been issued.

YTS

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state, at the latest convenient date, the number of young people in Scotland registered at careers offices as unemployed and seeking a position on a YTS scheme who have not obtained one.

Mr. Rifkind: Information is not available in the precise form requested. However, on 5 January 1987, of those young people in Scotland who had been unemployed since leaving school during the academic year 1985-86 and who were actively seeking a place on two-year YTS, only 366 were still awaiting an offer.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Surinam

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the French Government over the protection of British interests in Surinam.

Mr. Eggar: None.

Nuclear Test Ban Treaty

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has received any communication from the five continents peace initiative, Delhi six, on its initiatives to assist with the verification of compliance with a nuclear test ban treaty; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The President of Mexico wrote to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 25 August 1986 about the meeting of the Heads of State and Government of the six nations/five continents group in Ixtapa Mexico on 6-7 August. My right hon. and learned Friend also received a parallel message from the Mexican Foreign Minister.

We welcome the emphasis which the Ixtapa meeting placed on verification issues, but we believe it would be premature to re-open negotiations on a comprehensive test ban treaty until progress in resolving outstanding issues particularly on verification becomes more apparent.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Mid Sussex, specifically discussed the outstanding problems of verification of a comprehensive test ban treaty during his recent visit to Moscow to meet his counterparts in the Soviet Foreign Ministry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I emphasised the importance of verification of arms control agreements across the board.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further initatives his Department intends to take at the United Nations committee on disarmament in achieving an agreement on the verification of a comprehensive test ban treaty.

Mr. Renton: We continue to believe that the correct approach is to pursue further work at the conference on disarmament at Geneva through (a) an ad hoc committee with a non-negotiating mandate as proposed by the western group in 1984. We hope other countries will be able to respond to this, particularly those who claim that all verification issues have been resolved; (b) the ad hoc group of scientific experts, next meeting in March. The United Kingdom will continue to play an active role in this group.

Nuclear Test, Nevada

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the United Kingdom has any involvement in the planned nuclear test at the Nevada test site in the United States of America on 5 February; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We routinely announce joint United Kingdom-United States tests. It would not be appropriate to comment further on the reported United States test.

Nuclear Warheads

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to what extent it is necessary to test British nuclear warheads periodically for reliability; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: As long as a comprehensive nuclear test ban fails to be negotiated the United Kingdom will continue to conduct tests in order to maintain the effectiveness of its nuclear capabilities.

Mr. Ravell Langeveldt

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has made representations to the Governments of Kenya, Djibouti and the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen regarding their refusal to offer medical assistance to the South African seaman Mr. Ravell Langeveldt who was eventually admitted to St. Thomas's hospital, London.

Mr. Eggar: We were not directly concerned and there was therefore no grounds for United Kingdom representations. Mr. Langeveldt was admitted under emergency procedures to the United Kingdom to receive the medical treatment he required. He has now recovered and returned to South Africa.

Helsinki Final Act

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs by what means Her Majesty's Government monitor progress in the implementation by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and East European countries of the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act during the last six months.

Mr. Renton: During the six-month period to 30 December 1986 implementation by the Soviet and Eastern European countries of their commitments under the Helsinki Final Act and the Madrid concluding document has continued to be generally unsatisfactory although compliance has varied from country to country. As a whole, the Soviet Union and the countries of Eastern Europe continued to take a one-sided view of the CSCE process, emphasising security and economic aspects at the expense of humanitarian issues. Indeed, there have been widespread breaches of the provisions relating to human rights and fundamental freedoms, most notably in the Soviet Union.

Security in Europe: principles guiding relations between participating states; confidence-building measures and certain aspects of security and disarmament (Basket I)

The most striking feature of Eastern performance over the period was the continued violation of principle VII which covers

"respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief".

There has been no substantial change in the Soviet Union's unsatisfactory implementation of the Helsinki Final Act and Soviet performance in the field of human rights continued to be poor. Soviet persecution of dissidents, refuseniks and religious activists continued as did suppression of national minorities and persecution of political prisoners and their families. Prisoners of conscience continued to die while serving sentences. In August Mark Morozov, a member of the free trade union SMOT died in Chistopol prison, while in December, Anatoly Marchenko, a founder member of the Moscow Helsinki group, who had gone on hunger strike in August in protest against penal conditions, also died. He had similarly been transferred to Chistopol prison. In November, his family had evidently been told to reapply for permission to emigrate to Israel. The level of harassment to which believers, among others, were subjected, continued to be very harsh. The Jewish community continued to face difficulties over emigration and in practising its religion and culture. The monthly figures for Jewish emigration, although slightly higher than the previous reporting period, remained still unacceptably low. Confiscation of religious material from the homes of Soviet Jews, particularly of refuseniks, was widespread and the pressures on the teaching of Hebrew maintained. Details of the ill treatment of the Hebrew teacher Alexei Magarik (currently serving a three-year sentence) became known. He has reportedly been subjected to beatings whilst in camp.

The Russian Orthodox Deacon Rusak who wrote in 1983 to the World Council of Churches detailing the obstacles placed in the way of religious education in the USSR and subsequently sought permission to emigrate, was on 27 September sentenced to seven years in a labour camp and five in internal exile for "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda".

Others imprisoned for independent religious activities such as Alexander Ogorodnikov, remained in labour camps.

Other religious groups also suffered persecution and the penal conditions to which believers were subjected continued to be harsh in the extreme. Soviet law requires any such groups to register with the authorities and aims to ensure that they play no part in the wider community except when called upon to support official policies or deny reports of oppression. Members of unregistered Baptist groups were harassed as were unofficial activists of the Russian Orthodox and Catholic Churches. Groups such as Jehovah's Witnesses and the Uniate Catholic Church remained proscribed organisations. The period was marked by continued efforts of Lithuanian Catholics to recover use of several of their most venerated churches which had been seized by the authorities. The Soviet authorities continued to exert steady pressure to encourage Muslim inhabitants of Central Asia and Azerbaidzhan to abandon their religion, although Soviet sources suggested that such efforts were not particularly successful. Very few mosques in these regions were open for use and there were few officially recognised clergy. Muslim clergy not sanctioned by the authorities were attacked in the official press. Even tiny religious groups were not immune to pressure. Hare Krishna followers in particular suffered arrest, persecution and confinement to psychiatric hospitals. They have been refused permission to register formally as religious communities.

During the period under review, members of the "Group to Establish Trust Between the USSR and USA" continued to be subject to official harassment and arrest. Trust group member Larisa Chukayeva was sentenced in July to two years general-regime labour camp and deprived of parental rights over her child. However, she was reportedly released in December as was another member, Nina Kovalenko, who had again been committed to a mental hospital in October after trying to demonstrate on behalf of the arrested United States journalist, Nicholas Daniloff. This was another example of the continued abuse of psychiatry.

There were a number of promising developments, most notably the decision announced by Gorbachev personally on 16 December to permit Dr. Sakharov and his wife to return to Moscow from Gorky without laying down any conditions. In addition, there was the permission granted for a long-term victim of psychiatric abuse, Nikolai Baranov, to emigrate to the United Kingdom in August; the sudden release from prison in October of Irina Ratushinskaya, a poetess from the Ukraine and the permission granted to her and her husband to come to the United Kingdom in December; the release of Yuri Orlov, the founder of a Helsinki monitoring group; the emigration permission granted to a few well-known refusniks such as the Medvedkovs and the family of Natan Sharansky and to Dr. Vladimir Brodsky, founder of the trust group. But many other well-known individuals continued to suffer imprisonment and harassment. Dr. Koryagin who helped to expose the abuse of psychiatry for political purposes remained in prison and in ill health.

Bulgarian implementation of CSCE commitments remained poor. Bulgaria continued to violate principle VII on respect for human rights. The practise of religion, in particular that of Islam, remained difficult with Moslem rights restricted or forbidden. The Bulgarian authorities also continued to exert total control over all other religious communities and to limit their rights to practise their beliefs. Recent reports suggest that the general situation of the Turkish minority in Bulgaria remains profoundly unsatisfactory in most areas including culture, religion, education and information.

Czechoslovak performance on CSCE implementation remained unsatisfactory. Concern was heightened by the arrest in September of seven leading members of the Jazz section.

CSCE documents and other material relevant to the fulfilment of Czechoslovakia's CSCE commitments were confiscated from the section's offices. Freedom of conscience remained severely restricted and access to information tightly controlled. The right to know and act upon human rights was similarly restricted.

The East German implementation record, whilst showing improvements in some areas, remained on the whole unsatisfactory. Restrictions on human rights and individual freedoms remained a central problem. Although a larger number of East German citizens below pensionable age were allowed to visit the West, the GDR authorities continued to limit severely travel to non-Communist countries, and to use force if necessary to stop individuals who wish to exercise their right to leave the country; on 24 November East German border guards shot and probably killed a young man trying to enter the Western sectors of Berlin from the GDR. Compared with some other Warsaw pact countries, the Church enjoyed considerable freedom of movement, although Christians continued to face problems and discrimination. The GDR continued to be highly restrictive in the dissemination of information and working conditions of journalists remained unsatisfactory.

Overall Hungarian compliance with CSCE commitments remained good in comparison with other East European states. Relations between churches and the state remained harmonious. However, freedom of expression was still limited and selective action taken against potential internal opposition.

Human rights in Poland have improved somewhat in the last six months. A new clemency law in July led to the release of political detainees (although those people charged with offences such as terrorism and espionage which may have been politically motivated, remain in prison). The authorities also made available non-custodial penalties for more political offences. A new social consultative council was established in December and there are proposals to create ombudsmen. These steps are all welcome, although the prospects for permanent improvement remain uncertain. There continued to be a high degree of religious freedom in Poland and few impediments to foreign travel. In spite of censorship, the level of real debate in the press remained relatively high.

The human rights situation in Romania has deteriorated even further. Basic rights such as freedom of speech, freedom of the press and freedom of assembly were ruthlessly denied. The practice of religious belief continued to be circumscribed by the authorities. Members of religious groups who did not keep within the strict limits prescribed were liable to harassment and arrest and in some cases beatings. Travel in general became more difficult and contacts with foreigners were discouraged.

Confidence and Security-Building Measures

Two major military manoeuvres were notified by Warsaw pact countries in accordance with the Helsinki Final Act: one in the GDR from 8-13 September and one in Czechoslovakia from 10-12 September: observers were invited to the latter exercise only. The principal development in the area of confidence-building measures was the adoption of the Stockholm document on 19 September. This represents a significant step forward from the modest confidence-building measures in the Helsinki Final Act. The main elements of the document are:

(i) the annual exchange of forecasts of military activities;

(ii) notice 42 days in advance of military activities involving at least 13,000 troops or 300 tanks;

(iii) notice 42 days in advance of amphibious or airborne activities involving at least 3,000 troops;

(iv) mandatory invitation of observers to all military activities involving at least 17,000 troops, or to amphibious or airbone activities involving at least 5,000 troops;

(v) on-site inspection from the ground, from the air or both.

Co-operation in the field of economics, of science and technology and of the environment (Basket II)

In general, little improvement occurred in the conditions for conducting business in Eastern Europe, with Western business men confronted by considerable obstacles of a purely practical nature. The same bureaucratic foreign trade structure have continued to prevail which, because of tedious procedures and delays, discourages many foreign business interests. Poor economic and trade performance in some countries, coupled with a general tendency to secrecy, have resulted in an unwillingness to publish information and statistical data, although the Soviet Union published for the first time figures for the harvest for the last five years. Much more important data, for example on hard currency resources, remains unavailable. However, a law providing for joint ventures came into force in Poland in July and the Soviet Union has shown signs of changing its laws to facilitate joint ventures; and to loosen its state monopoly on foreign trade and facilitate access to end users in some areas.

Co-operation in Humanitarian and other fields (Basket III)

Most East European countries continued to show a largely negative record in the fields of family visits, family reunification and contacts with individuals from states outside the Warsaw Pact. Hungary and Poland were notable exceptions. Overall, emigration to the West continued at a low level. In the Soviet Union exit visas were difficult to obtain and persons applying for exit visas continued to suffer discrimination and harassment by the authorities. New legislation governing entry to, and exit from, the USSR was passed in August (to come into effect on 1 January 1987). It was criticised by many refuseniks and others for containing restrictive wording and failing to close loopholes permitting arbitrary decisions. Family reunifications were still a problem and a hard core of cases remained unresolved. The Czechoslovak situation regarding family visits also remained unsatisfactory. Romania in particular took steps to discourage contacts with foreigners. With very few exceptions restrictions remained in force in all Warsaw pact countries on individuals wishing to visit the West, as well as on access to Western diplomatic missions.

Censorship and lack of information for the general public continued to be a dominant festure in Warsaw pact countries, although the record varied from country to country. Interference with Western broadcasts continued, especially by the Soviet Union, which consistently jammed BBC Russian and Polish service broadcasts on short wave. Availability of Western newspapers also continued to be limited.

Co-operation and exchanges in the field of culture and education

Bureaucratic and economic restraints continued to be the main impediments to active bilateral relations. On the whole, existing agreements and projects were implemented in a satisfactory manner, although Romania reduced its cultural exchanges and narrowed its co-operation with Western nations in the educational sphere.

Middle East (United Nations Peace Conference)

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what vote was cast by Her Majesty's Government at the United Nations General Assembly on 4 December 1986 as regards the preparations to be made for an international peace conference on the middle east.

Mr. Renton: On 4 December, in the company of most of our European partners, we voted against an UNGA resolution (41/162A) on the situation in the middle east, which, inter alia, called for an international conference and the convening of a preparatory committee, because of the resolution, lack of balance and immoderate language. On 2 December we abstained on UNGA resolution 41/43D which specifically addressed the question of an international conference.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Mentally Handicapped People

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress has been made so far with regard to the care-in-the-community policy in-so-far as it concerns the mentally handicapped; and if he will make a statement on the short and long term financial implications of this policy.

Mrs. Currie: Substantial progress has been made. The majority of mentally handicapped people continue to live with their families or independently, usually supported by local authority, health and voluntary services. The number of mentally handicapped people living in hospitals has been falling steadily for many years while numbers living elsewhere, including local authority and local authority sponsored accommodation, and small NHS units in the community, have risen. The provision of local authority day services has increased. Relevant figures are available in my Department's various publications on health and personal social services statistics, copies of which are available in the Library.

Estimated gross current expenditure on mental handicap in-patient services amounted to £461 million in 1984-85, an increase in real terms of around 13 per cent. over 1978-79, reflecting an increase in staff-patient ratio. Personal Social Services gross current expenditure (including joint finance) on residential and day care services for mentally handicapped people has also increased steadily in real terms and stood at some £241 million in 1984-85, an increase in real terms of around 54 per cent. over 1978-79. 1984-85 figures are provisional.

Community care is not a cheap option and is not intended to be. These figures illustrate both the improvements which have been achieved and the money invested in making them happen. Health authorities' strategic plans envisage continued growth in overall expenditure on mentally handicapped people. Social security costs will inevitably rise as normal benefits replace the personal allowances paid in hospital.

The provisional figure for personal social services provision in the rate support grant settlement for 1987-88 includes an extra £27 million for the development of community care generally. Decisions on priorities for local government spending are the responsibility of individual local authorities.

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy with regard to the degree of local authority involvement in care-in-the-community developments in so far as they affect the mentally handicapped; what financial provision he expects local authorities to make in the realisation of this project; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Social services departments have been encouraged to play an increasingly important role with regard to care in the community developments. The long-standing policy is to develop a comprehensive range of co-ordinated health and social services for mentally handicapped people and their families, including assessment, day services and long-term and respite residential care in each locality, and to achieve a major shift from institutional care for mentally handicapped people to a range of community care provided by the statutory, voluntary and private sectors according to individual needs, with a corresponding shift of resources.

At the same time the continued run-down of large mental handicap hospitals will proceed, but specialised residential health provision, which may be in small units in the community, will continue to be needed for people with special medical or nursing needs, as well as specialist health support for those in other settings.

The business of recognising the changing needs of mentally handicapped people is a multi-disciplinary and multi-authority one. The balance between authorities may shift, from time to time and from individual to individual, but the basic point of contingent responsibilities remains. Authorities should listen to mentally handicapped people and their families and, as far as possible, offer them choices which are genuine and explicit.

The priority for mental handicap services has been emphasised in successive policy documents and regional review letters to Chairmen of Regional Health Authorities, available in the Library, and is explained with fuller comment on policies in the Government's response to the report of the House of Commons Social Services Committee on Community Care (Cmnd. 9674).

Under the care in the community arrangements health authorities can transfer funds for as long as necessary to pay local authorities or, with the agreement of local authorities, voluntary organisations, for community care for people moving out of hospital. In addition, NHS joint finance enables health authorities and local authorities to launch jointly planned schemes for mentally handicapped people.

Priorities for increased spending by local authorities are for local decision but we would hope the additional provision for care in the community developments included in the 1987-88 Rate Support Grant Settlement and the potential availability of resources from NHS authorities will enable local authorities to continue to give priority to the development of community services for mentally handicapped people.

Pensions

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give details of the total number of people in the United Kingdom in receipt of (a) supplementary pension only, (b) public sector pension, (c) retirement pension and (d) retirement pension and supplementary pension, for each of the years 1985 and 1986.

Mr. Lyell: The information available is as follows:

Great Britain (Thousands)

Supplementary pension only	89	94
United Kingdom public sector pension	NA	NA

Health Expenditure

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the annual growth of expenditure needed by the hospital and community services in each of the next five years in order to keep pace with the increase in the number of the elderly, medical advances and improved services; and what increase in expenditure has been in fact committed to meet the expected growth in the current year.

Mr. Newton: Expenditure on the hospital and community health services in 1987-88 will increase in cash terms by 6·0 per cent., which is some 2·2 per cent. above forecast general inflation. In addition authorities are expected to release some £150 million (1¼ per cent.) cash as a result of planned cost improvements. From within these total additional resources they will be expected to meet all pay and price increases arising in the year and to meet the additional costs arising from demographic change and from implementation of specific policy objectives.

The estimated increases in expenditure required to keep pace with demographic change are set out in the table. Increases in activity arising from medical advance are estimated to absorb in the region of half a per cent. of resources annually. The level of spending required to improve services will depend on decisions as to specific policy objectives over the period. In the current year these are estimated at some half of one per cent.

1987-88	1·0
1988-89	1·0
1989-90	1·0
1990-91	0·9
1991-92	0·7

Eye Consultants (Waiting Times)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the waiting time for initial referral by doctors to eye consultants in each of the hospitals in the Tameside district health authority, Stockport district health authority and each of the Manchester district health authorities; if he will give a breakdown by named consultants; and what is the average number of referrals being dealt with by each consultant.

Mr. Newton: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the information he seeks. No information is held centrally on numbers awaiting out-patient appointments. The hon. Member may wish to write to the chairmen of the district health authorities concerned who may be able to provide the information requested.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury on 12 December 1986, Official Report, column 286, indicating for various income bands the entitlement to standard housing benefit of a one-child family with one working partner, he will indicate what figure was used in calculating the benefit amounts listed in the table for the amount of housing benefit included in the family income.

Mr. Lyell: I am not sure which figure the hon. Member is seeking. In answering his earlier question we carried out the normal standard housing benefit calculation as follows:

(a) the weekly rent was £16·00, so the 60 per cent. starting point was £9·60;
(b) the needs allowance applicable to a one-child family was £85·45;
(c) the various income bands were converted to weekly amounts by dividing by 52; the earnings disregard of £17·30 was then subtracted to give assessable income;
(d) the starting point at (a) was then increased or decreased by the appropriate taper; 25 per cent. of the difference between the assessable income and the needs allowance for the first three bands, whose income was below the needs allowance; and 29 per cent. of the difference for the last two bands, whose income was above;

(c) finally, the minimum payment rule of 50 pence was applied in the case of the last income band.

Incontinence

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to ensure that resources are available to ensure that every person suffering from, or suspected as suffering from, incontinence receives a medical and nursing assessment; what information he has about variations from one part of the country to another in this regard; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: We would expect each health district to have arrangements for multi-disciplinary assessment for people suffering from incontinence. We do not collect information about the precise form of clinical services, and it is for individual authorities to decide for themselves how best to allocate their resources to meet their local needs and circumstances.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what evaluations have been made on the quality of the goods used in the management of incontinence; what evaluation units have been set up within his Department; what are proposed in assessing the quality of goods; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Two evaluations carried out under the DHSS aids assessment programme were reported on in 1982-83. These covered incontinence garments and incontinence aids for handicapped children.

More recently, an evaluation study of incontinence pads and garments was funded by the Department at the department of geriatric medicine, University College hospital medical school. The report of this study was published in the Health Equipment Information series (No. 159, October 1986). Further work is being undertaken and will be reported in due course.

Discussions are in progress with a view to establishing an evaluation unit to undertake a programme of assessments of incontinence products. The need for such assessment is recognised as an important means of achieving the most effective use of the significant resources devoted to this area.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what support his Department is giving to the research into uro-dynamic investigation; if he will provide funds for the establishment of regional uro-dynamic investigation units; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Uro-dynamic investigation is an established part of urological practice. It would be for health authorities to decide on the need for regional uro-dynamic investigation units and to fund them from their allocated resources.

Research in this field may be undertaken in academic departments of urology and other departments with urological interests. The Department is not supporting such research centrally, but I understand that basic urological research is being supported by the Medical Research Council, which is the main government-funded agency for medical and biological research in the United Kingdom and receives its grant-in-aid through the science budget of the Department of Education and Science.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what advice his Department gives to general practitioners and hospital authorities regarding the treatment of incontinence caused by constipation; what investigations his Department has done on the subject of bowel management and faecal impaction; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what guidelines his Department gives with regard to the management of bowel problems by non-skilled and untrained assistants in geriatric units and residential homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: General guidance on the management of incontinence is given in the handbook of guidelines "Improving Geriatric Care in Hospital" and the memorandum of guidance "Residential homes for the elderly—Arrangements for Health Care".

Guidance for general practitioners will be included in a training package under development as part of the Department's Helping the Community to Care programme.

In geriatric units, a trained nurse will have the responsibility for planning the care of patients. Tasks undertaken by nursing auxiliaries should be under the direction and observation of the nurse.

In residential homes, care assistants should be under the supervision of trained staff. Advice and guidance on health care should be available from the resident's own general practitioner and the community nursing service.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department will provide courses for general practitioners to assist them to recognise overflow incontinence in the case of severely constipated patients who are referred to geriatric hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: No; but I refer the hon. Member to the reply given him by my hon. Friend the Minister for Health on 13 January 1987 at columns 172-173 in which he pointed to the role of regional general practice educational sub-committees.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services who is responsible for co-ordinating and advising on the problems of incontinence and its treatment in all forms; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Arrangements for co-ordinating and advising on the problems of incontinence, its treatment and the provision of services are best left to individual health and local authorities. Many authorities have appointed continence advisers to carry out these functions, following advice given by the Department's Chief Nursing Officer in 1977 that the management of incontinence should be clearly identified as the responsibility of a designated special nurse. For individuals suffering incontinence, advice on treatment and management of the problem should be sought from their general practitioner, district nurse or health visitor.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assistance his Department is giving to the Disabled Living Foundation and other voluntary organisations concerned with the care, treatment and cure of incontinent people; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The Department makes an annual grant towards the costs of the five main services provided by the Disabled Living Foundation, including its Incontinence Advisory Service. It is for the foundation to decide how to divide the grant between the five services. I understand that in the last completed financial year, 1985-86, the Foundation allocated £28,380 to the Incontinence Advisory Service.

Under the "Helping the Community to Care" programme, the Department is funding a three-year project being run by Age Concern (England) to develop a pack of detailed advisory leaflets for those suffering from incontinence and for their carers. This pack should be of significant benefit not only to individuals but also to voluntary organisations which help with the problem.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what developments have taken place regarding the care of incontinent people in the community, in homes and in hospital since April 1980; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I refer the hon. Member to the replies given him by my hon. Friend the Minister for Health on 13 January 1987 at columns 173-74 and to my other replies to him today, in which reference is made to general guidance on the management of incontinence, to the growth in numbers of continence advisers, to the assessment of incontinence aids and garments, and to the research which has been carried out. These and other relevant developments will be reviewed at the seminar planned for February 1987.

Bowel Problems

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department will promote a research programme and study of the number of patients in psychiatric hospitals who are suffering from mental confusion caused by faecal impaction; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The results of research on faecal incontinence are widely available and there does not seem to be any particular need for additional study at the present time. Mental confusional states can arise from and be influenced by many different physical causes. This is particularly true of elderly people whatever the setting, and bowel functioning can influence and be influenced by mental state. So the identification and treatment of these and other physical conditions are an essential part of accepted good clinical practice in mental illness hospitals as in other settings.

Careful assessment of the physical state of people who are mentally ill, particularly the elderly, is important and for this reason the Department has provided guidance to health authorities recommending close working links between medical services for the elderly and for the elderly mentally ill. It also recommends the location of units as part of the acute services in the district general hospital for the assessment and treatment of elderly mentally ill people.

AIDS

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in combating the spread of AIDS.

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend outlined the progress made in this country and our plans for further action in his speech during the debate on AIDS in the House on 21 November.

In the European Community proposals have been developed for coordinated research as part of the fourth general Community medical research programme 1987-1989. Member States have also cooperated with other international organisations, notably the WHO collaborating Centre on AIDS in Paris, which published on 5 December its latest report on "AIDS Surveillance in Europe."

The European Council on 5-6 December asked the Council of Ministers and the Commission to ensure effective exchange of information in the Community about the spread of AIDS, its prevention and treatment, and to consider further cooperative measures.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if the new pamphlet on AIDS is being distributed to (i) prisoners, (ii) hospital patients and (iii) patients attending drug and veneral disease clinics;

(2) what steps he is taking to distribute the pamphlet his Department has produced on AIDS to homeless people.

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for the Home Office, is arranging to distribute copies of the AIDS leaflet to prisoners.

We are supplying all doctors, nurses and hospital managers with copies of the leaflet, and making them available also to retail pharmacists. We are also producing a poster version of the leaflet for use in waiting rooms.

The leaflet will shortly be available in post offices and is being offered to such public outlets as libraries and Citizens Advice Bureaux. These are natural points of collection for homeless people, and we are also examining the possible role of appropriate voluntary organisations.

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has concerning the incidence of AIDS by ethnic grouping.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 12 December 1986, c. 294]: The records do not show the ethnic origin of all acquired immune deficiency syndrome patients in the United Kingdom, but such information as we have to November 1986 is as follows:

White 466
Non-White 17
Not Stated 116

Retirement Pensioners

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many retirement pensioners were of the age of 80 years and above at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Major: About 1·8 million at March 1986.

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the current rate of supplement to the basic rate of retirement pension for those aged 80 years and above if that supplement had been indexed to the cost of living since its introduction in 1971.

Mr. Major: If the age addition of 25 pence had been increased in line with the increase in the retail price index since its introduction in September 1971, it would have risen to £1·15 in July 1986.

Communications Aids Centre, West Bromwich

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to continue the partial funding of the communications aids centre in West Bromwich; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: Central funding for the West Bromwich (Sandwell) communications aids centre was made available by the Department and the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation on a pump-priming basis only, for the five-year period 1 April 1982 to 31 March 1987. It was a condition for receiving funding that Sandwell health authority would take over full funding with effect from 1 April 1987.

Drink-vending Machines

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what guidelines he has issued to general practitioners and consultants treating diabetics and sufferers from peptic ulcers in relation to the presence of dried milk in drink-vending machines;

(2) whether he will encourage the display of health warning notices on drink-vending machines for diabetics and sufferers from peptic ulcers, due to the high sugar level of creamers used.

Mrs. Currie: "Whiteners" in vending machines can contain a variety of substances, including glucose and dried milk. Doctors are aware of this and if they feel that these substances may be a danger to their patients it is for them to give appropriate dietary advice. Any guidelines would be for the medical profession rather than the Department. We do not feel that health warnings on vending machines are necessary.

Population Statistics (Dundee)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many recipients of supplementary benefit in Dundee in 1981 were one-parent families.

Mr. Lyell: I regret that this information is not available.

Care in the Community

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the finding of the recent report from the Audit Commission for Local Authorities for England and Wales that the Government's care in the community policy is wasteful, disorganised and causing unnecessary suffering to elderly and disabled people.

Mrs. Currie: The Government's view is that substantial progress has already been made in carrying forward the policy of community care which has been accepted by successive Governments. We cannot accept that the Audit Commission's Report properly reflects this progress. However we recognise that there are still problems to be solved, and my right hon. Friend announced in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) on 16 December 1986 at columns 461-62 that he had asked Sir Roy Griffiths to undertake an overview of community care policy.

Hypothermia

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will issue a special circular to DHSS offices and to local authority social services departments concerning the danger during cold weather of hypothermia amongst the elderly and very young.

Mrs. Currie: Local authority social services departments and the National Health Service have, over many years, developed systems and skills to enable them to react to the danger of hypothermia during periods of cold weather. The staff of DHSS local offices are also aware of the dangers of hypothermia, and would be able to offer advice on benefits if they came across a potential case during the course of a home visit. The Health Education Council, which is funded by the Government, makes available each year, in conjunction with Age Concern, an advisory leaflet on hypothermia for elderly people, and has recently launched a detailed training package on hypothermia aimed at health and social services staff. In the light of this, we do not consider that there is a need for a special circular.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give (a) the daily mean temperature and (b) the weekly mean temperature for each of the weather stations used for calculating severe weather payments for the week 12 January to 18 January.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many severe weather payments were made in 1986 in (a) England, (b) Scotland and (c) Wales; what was the total amount involved in each country; and what was the average individual payment in each country.

Mr. Major: Final returns showing the number and cost of severe weather payments made in 1986 are still awaited from a few local offices in England and Scotland. The latest information available is as follows:

Country	Number of payments	Amount paid £	Average payment £
England	333,076	8,622,037	25·89
Scotland	84,181	1,926,689	22·89
Wales[1]	38,769	1,039,294	26·81

[1] Final figures.

Final figures for England and Scotland may not be available for some weeks, but it is unlikely that they will be substantially different from those given in the table.

Child Benefit

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the latest available figures for the number of households in receipt of child benefit in the Thurrock constituency.

Mr. Lyell: Child benefit is administered centrally and there is no information specific to Thurrock.

Pensioners (Thurrock)

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the latest available figures for the number of pensioners in receipt of the state pension in the Thurrock constituency, giving the number of single pensioners, and the number of married couples.

Mr. Lyell: I regret that the information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Statistics are not held on pensioner numbers by parliamentary constituency.

School Clothing (Payments)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the number of applications for discretionary payments made by families of school-age children in Scotland for the provision of school clothing that have been rejected by local offices of his Department in the period 1981 to 1986.

Mr. Major: I regret I am unable to supply the information requested as the existing statistics on the number of rejected single payment claims do not separately identify the item(s) for which the payment was refused.

NHS (Staff Statistics)

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will set out the numbers of (a) midwives, (b) doctors and (c) nurses in the National Health Service in England and Wales in 1978 and at the latest date for which figures are available; and whether he will provide a similar breakdown for the numbers in the four Thames regional health authorities for the same years.

Mr. Newton: The figures for Wales are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. The other figures requested are shown in the following table. Figures for September 1985 are the latest available to this level of detail.

National Health Service Doctors, Nursing Staff and Midwifery Staff—England and the four Thames Regions

Whole-Time Equivalents[1]

	England	North West Thames	North East Thames	South East Thames	South West Thames	Thames Regions[4] [5]

Heating Additions

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people in 1984 were in receipt of a heating addition in (a) England, (b) Scotland and (c) Wales; and what was the total expenditure in each country on heating additions.

Mr. Major: The total expenditure in each country on heating additions is not available but it is estimated that total expenditure in Great Britain in 1984-85 was approximately £400 million. I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible on the number of people in receipt of a heating addition in each country.

Expert Advisory Committees

Sir Philip Holland asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the reply of 15 December, Official Report, column 420, when he expects to reply in full to the hon. Member for Gedling's question on expert advisory committees.

Mrs. Currie: I replied to my hon. Friend yesterday.

Local Offices

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of benefit offices which have closed for (a) the whole and (b) part of this past week due to the severe weather conditions.

Mr. Lyell: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Food Poisoning

Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of food poisoning have arisen in (a) Wakefield and (b) Yorkshire in each of the past five years which originated abroad; and what further steps he intends to take to seek to protect people travelling abroad from contracting food poisoning.

Mrs. Currie: The statistics requested are not readily available. Advice to travellers on taking care with certain foods is included in the Department's leaflet—SA 35—"Protect Your Health Abroad." Two million copies are issued annually. A copy is available in the Library.

Proguaril Hydrochloride

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received regarding the supply of proguaril hydrochloride, the anti-malarial drug, in the Greater London area.

Mrs. Currie: None.

Overseas Voters

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many overseas voters have been registered for each United Kingdom parliamentary constituency.

Mrs. Currie: The information required will not be available centrally until the end of April 1987. Overseas voters were not eligible to vote prior to the compilation of the 1986 register. As a result of changes in the regulations (The Representation of Peoples Act 1985) by the Home Office which followed a report by the Select Committee on Home Affairs, some people resident overseas can now vote. The 1986 register is the first to be affected.

Slimming Aids

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the figures of net expenditure on slimming aids and prophylactics, respectively, provided by the National Health Service for the last four complete years for which figures are available.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 16 January 1987]: Full information is not available in the form requested. The costs to the family practitioner services of slimming aids supplied by chemists are:

Net ingredient cost of appetite suppressants (England)

Year	Bulk forming types £	Centrally active types £
1982	360,000	2,020,000
1983	260,000	1,840,000
1984	250,000	1,560,000
1985	270,000	1,260,000

The corresponding expenditure in the hospital and community health services is not collected centrally.

Kidney Patients

Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give (a) the number of patients on the high priority waiting list for kidney transplants in May 1986 and (b) the number of patients on that list who have since been found matching kidneys for transplant.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 16 January 1987]: In May 1986 there were eight patients on the United Kingdom Transplant Service's "clinically urgent" list for kidney transplant (those patients whose consultants considered them unlikely to survive more than about four weeks without a transplant). Six have since had transplants, one was removed from the list as unsuitable for transplant and one died while waiting for a suitably matched kidney.

DEFENCE

Military Convoy (Accident)

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Defence why his Department dispatched to the scene of the convoy accident in Wiltshire on 10 January a recovery vehicle which was unable to lift the crashed transporter vehicle.

Mr. Stanley: The crane used to right the vehicle involved in the accident completed the operation successfully.

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the officers in command of the Royal Air Force convoy involved in an accident in Wiltshire on 10 January knew (a) that the road leading to their destination had not been gritted, and (b) the exact weight of the transporter that crashed.

Mr. Stanley: As far as the first part of the hon. Member's question is concerned, the extent of the commander of the convoy's knowledge of the road conditions is a matter that will be addressed by the report of the Board of Inquiry. I understand that the vehicle involved in the accident weighed about 22·5 tons.

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set up an inquiry of Privy Councillors into the accident to the Royal Air Force convoy in Wiltshire on 10 January.

Mr. Stanley: No.

Nuclear Weapons (Germany)

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the types of nuclear weapons that are currently in the ownership of the 1st British Corps in West Germany;

(2) if he will list the types of nuclear weapons currently under the control of 1st British Corps in Germany.

Mr. Stanley: The British Army in the Federal Republic of Germany operates one regiment of Lance surface-to-surface missiles and five regiments of nuclear-capable artillery. The nuclear warheads for both the missiles and the artillery are owned by and in the custody of the USA.

Armed Forces (Staff Losses)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many pilots left the Royal Air Force in 1986 or have expressed a desire to leave the service.

Mr. Freeman: The number of pilots who left the RAF in 1986 was 175. The number of pilots who expressed a desire in 1986 to leave the service was 213. The latter figure includes those applying for premature voluntary retirement, those signifying their intention to leave at optional exit points and optional retirement dates, and those who have been offered assimilation to age 55 but have declined.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many pilots left the Royal Air Force during 1986 without completing their engagements.

Mr. Freeman: The numbers of pilots who left the RAF during 1986 without completing their engagements are as follows:

	Number
(a) Through premature voluntary retirement	63
(b) At a recognised optional exit point	39
(c) Other exits (medical, death, disciplinary etc)	12
Total	114

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many pilots have expressed a desire to leave the Royal Air Force without completing their engagement.

Mr. Freeman: The numbers of pilots who in 1986 expressed a desire to leave the RAF without completing their engagements are as follows:

	Number
a) Through premature voluntary retirement	119
b) At a recognised optional exit point	65

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Navy flying observers have expressed a desire to leave the service without having completed their engagement.

Mr. Freeman: During 1986 a total of seven observers applied to leave the service, six through voluntary retirement without having completed their engagement and one by applying to take the optional eight-year break point for departure which is currently a condition of service for aircrew officers serving on a 12-year short career commission.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Navy helicopter pilots have expressed a desire to leave the service without having completed their engagement.

Mr. Freeman: During 1986 a total of 23 helicopter pilots applied to leave the service, 13 through voluntary retirement without having completed their engagement and 10 by applying to take their optional eight-year Break Point.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Sea Harrier pilots left the Royal Navy during 1986, or have expressed a desire to leave the service.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many helicopter pilots have left the Royal Navy during 1986, or have expressed a desire to leave the service.

Mr. Freeman: During 1986 24 helicopter pilots left the Royal Navy. Of these, 12 left as a result of early voluntary retirement, five at their optional eight-year break point, five at the termination of their commissions; one was invalided out and one has died. In the same year a total of 23 helicopter pilots applied to leave the service. Of these, 13 applied for early voluntary retirement and 10 to leave at their optional eight-year break point.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many flying observers left the Royal Navy during 1986, or have expressed a desire to leave the service.

Mr. Freeman: During 1986 a total of 10 observers left the Royal Navy. of these, two left as a result of early voluntary retirement, two applied to leave at their optional eight-year break point and six left at the termination of their commissions. In the same year a total of seven Observers applied to leave the service, six through early voluntary retirements and one at his optional eight-year break point.

Tornado F3 Aircraft

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Tornado F3 aircraft are currently with the F3 operational conversion unit.

Mr. Stanley: It is not our practice to reveal details of numbers of operational aircraft.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Tornado F3 aircraft are now in squadron service.

Mr. Stanley: The first Tornado F3 Squadron is expected to form later this year. It is not our practice to reveal details of numbers of operational aircraft.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Tornado F3 aircraft have now been fitted with Foxhunter radar.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Sufficient Foxhunter radars have been fitted to Tornado air defence variant aircraft to support the Operational Conversion Unit which formed last year. It is not our practice to reveal numbers of aircraft in operational units.

British Forces in Germany (Costs)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the total annual cost of British forces in Berlin;

(2) what is the total annual cost of British forces in West Germany;

(3) what is the annual cost of the British Army of the Rhine;

(4) what is the annual cost of the Royal Air Force in Germany.

Mr. Stanley: The estimated costs for 1986-87 are shown below:

Commitment	Estimates 1986-87 prices £ million
BAOR (including reinforcement forces)	2,550
RAF Germany (including reinforcement forces)	897
Berlin	52
TOTAL (CENTRAL FRONT)	3,499

Armed Forces (Training)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Air Force pilots graduated from RAF Valley during 1986.

Mr. Freeman: One hundred and seven..

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Air Force pilots graduated from Royal Air Force Shawbury during 1986.

Mr. Freeman: Thirty-three.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Air Force pilots graduated from RAF Finningley during 1986.

Mr. Freeman: Fifty-six.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service men entered the Royal Air Force College, Cranwell, to train as pilots during 1986.

Mr. Freeman: Three hundred and twenty-nine.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service men entered the Royal Air College, Cranwell to train for navigation during 1986.

Mr. Freeman: One hundred and forty-two.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many navigators graduated from Royal Air Force Finningley during 1986.

Mr. Freeman: Eighty-five.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current cost of training a fast jet navigator for the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Freeman: The average cost to the Ministry of Defence of training a student navigator to the point when he joins an operational fast jet squadron is approximately £1 million (at 1984-85 prices).

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current cost of training a fast jet pilot for the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Freeman: The average cost to the Ministry of Defence of training a student pilot to the point when he joins an operational fast jet squadron is approximately £2·87 million (at 1984-85 prices).

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cost of training a Sea Harrier pilot.

Mr. Freeman: The cost of training a Sea Harrier pilot is approximately £3,700,000.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cost of training a Royal Navy helicopter pilot.

Mr. Freeman: Costs vary according to aircraft type and role, but the most usual form of helicopter pilot training in the Royal Navy, for Sea King ASW, costs approximately £530,000 per trainee.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cost of training a Royal Navy flying observer.

Mr. Freeman: The cost of training an observer in the Royal Navy is approximately £710,000.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service men entered Britannia Royal Naval College, Dartmouth, to train as pilots with the Fleet Air Arm in 1986.

Mr. Freeman: In 1986, 68 trainees entered Britannia Royal Naval College, Dartmouth, to commence training as pilots with the Fleet Air Arm.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service men entered Britannia Royal Naval College, Dartmouth, to train as flying observers with the Fleet Air Arm in 1986.

Mr. Freeman: In 1986, 87 trainees entered Britannia Naval College, Dartmouth, to commence training as observers with the Fleet Air Arm.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Navy officers graduated as flying observers during 1986.

Mr. Freeman: Forty-one Royal Naval officers completed operational flying training as observers during 1986.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Naval officers graduated as helicopter pilots in 1986.

Mr. Freeman: Thirty- seven Naval officers completed operational flying training as helicopter pilots in 1986.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Naval officers graduated as Sea Harrier pilots during 1986.

Mr. Freeman: Eight Royal Naval officers completed operational flying training as Sea Harrier pilots during 1986.

Aircraft Development (Funding)

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what funding has so far been given by his Department for developing the advanced short take-off and vertical landing aircraft.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United Kingdom and United States Governments are participating in a jointly agreed but separately funded programme of studies into propulsion and control technologies for a possible advised short take-off and vertical landing aircraft. The United Kingdom contribution to this programme so far amounts to about £2 million.

Helicopters

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many Wessex helicopters are currently in Royal Navy service;

(2) how many Wasp helicopters are currently in Royal Navy service;

(3) how many Sea King helicopters are in Royal Navy service;

(4) how many Lynx helicopters are in Royal Navy service.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to table 4 of annex C of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1986" (Cmnd. 9763-1). It is not our practice to reveal details of numbers of operational aircraft.

Allied Forces Baltic Approaches

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the Government have had any discussions within the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and with the Danish authorities on the possible ending or reduction of the United Kingdom commitment to deploy to the allied forces Baltic approaches in time of tension or war; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: The principal United Kingdom force currently assigned to strengthening the land defences of the Baltic approaches is the United Kingdom Mobile Force (Land). Because it is a self-sufficient expeditionary force, with a large number of deployment and employment options, this force inevitably has a disproportionately high level of support units. We are therefore discussing with NATO whether this contribution represents the most effective use of these resources. We have naturally kept the Danish authorities informed. Details of the discussions are confidential but it has been stressed that the United Kingdom has no intention of making unilateral changes to its commitment to the region.

Type 23 Frigate

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the command and control system for the type 23 frigate.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave on 19 January 1987.

Air Vice Marshal Robson

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the present role within his Department of Air Vice Marshal R. Robson; and what was his last posting.

Mr. Freeman: Air Vice Marshal R. M. Robson became head of the RAF study of officers' terms of service as from 19 January this year. From 20 July 1984 to January 16 last he was Director of Public Relations (RAF) in the rank of Air Commodore.

Devonport Dockyard

Mr. Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make an announcement on the future of Devonport dockyard.

Mr. Younger [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 778]: I am now satisfied that there exists the basis for an advantageous contract to be placed for the future operation of Devonport dockyard with Devonport Management Limited, a consortium formed by Brown and Root (UK) Limited, the Weir Group plc and Barclays de Zoete Wedd Limited.

Under arrangements that have been negotiated to date, such a contract could offer the possibility of saving some £123 million over the seven-year term contract, with the prospect of annual savings thereafter of about £40 million under any subsequent contract. As with our preferred contractor for Rosyth dockyard, Babcock Thorn Limited, the contract with Devonport Management Limited would encourage improvements in efficiency and enable the contractor to compete for commercial and naval work with no possibility of cross-subsidy from the core programme of naval refitting.

As my hon. Friend knows, when I announced our preferred contractor for Rosyth dockyard on 4 December [Official Report, Vol. 106, c. 771-2] I provided the trade unions with a full paper setting out the arguments in favour of commercial management, which I believe are valid both for Rosyth and Devonport, and providing information on the preferred contractor for Rosyth dockyard. I have invited trade union representatives to meet me again on 21 January before I take a final decision on the future management arrangements for Rosyth dockyard, and I have today provided further information to the trade unions summarising the main aspects of the draft contract arrangements negotiated with Devonport Management Limited. I will consider with the trades unions the question of additional time for them to make representations to me in respect of this latest paper before I take a final decision on the placing of a contract for the future operation of Devonport dockyard.

A copy of my latest paper for the trades unions has been placed in the Library of the House.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy on whether teachers being paid at an unqualified rate can have the appropriate increase in their pay backdated once the education authority has received notification of qualified teacher status.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Under existing regulations that cannot be done. The matter is under consideration and I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

New Works (Funding)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what funding for new works has been provided by his Department in each of the last five years; and how this has been distributed on a local education authority basis.

Mr. Dunn: Funding for local education authority capital expenditure is not provided by the Department, but is the responsibility of the LEAs. The level of capital spending they may undertake in any year is, however, limited to the allocation notified to them by the Department, plus the flexibilities permitted by the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. Table 1 lists each local education authority's allocation for each of the last five years. It is for the LEA to decide how its allocation should be spent.

The Department does provide grant-aid for capital projects undertaken by the governors of voluntary aided schools. Table 2 shows the amount of capital expenditure at such schools in its area, covering both commitments and new work, notified to each LEA as eligible for grant-aid in each of the last five years.

Expenditure

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of gross domestic product has been spent on the education budget in each year since 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The table shows total outturn public expenditure on education in the United Kingdom for the financial years 1979-80 to 1985-86 expressed as a percentage of average gross domestic product in each year, and estimated outturn for 1986-87 as a percentage of forecast GDP.

Financial years	Percentage
1980-81	5·5
1981-82	5·4
1982-83	5·3
1984-85	5·0
1985-86	4·7
1986-87	4·9

Committee on English

Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is yet in a position to announce the membership and terms of reference of the Committee on English.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have appointed Sir John Kingman FRS, Vice-Chancellor of Bristol university, to be chairman of the committee which I am setting up to make recommendations on a model of the workings of the English language to help improve teaching in schools.

The members of the committee are:

Professor Gillian Brown
Professor in Applied Linguistics and Dean of the School of Social Studies, University of Essex.

Mrs. A. S. Byatt FRSL
Writer, broadcaster and reviewer. Former Senior Lecturer in English at University College, London.

Professor Brian Cox
John Edward Taylor Professor of English Literature, University of Manchester.

Mr. Leonard Ellis
Senior Lecturer in Education, North Riding College. Former primary school headteacher.

Mr. Patrick J. Kavanagh
Poet, novelist and author of children's books.

Mr. Richard Knott
General adviser with responsibility for English and drama, Berkshire LEA.

Mrs. Pramila Le Hunte
Head of English Department, the North London Collegiate School.

Professor Peter Levi FSA FRSL
Professor of Poetry, University of Oxford and Fellow of St. Catherine's College, Oxford.

Miss Patricia Mann
Head of External Affairs, J. Walter Thompson Group and Editor of "Consumer Affairs".

Mr. Robert Robinson
Writer and broadcaster.

Mrs. Jeanne Strickland
Head of English Department, Camden School for Girls, London.

Dr. Charles Suckling FRS
Chairman, Bradbury, Suckling and Partners Ltd., Scientific Consultants.

Mr. Keith Waterhouse
Journalist, novelist and playwright.

Professor Henry Widdowson
Professor of Education and Head of Department of English for Speakers of Other Languages, University of London Institute of Education.

The secretary is Mr. Peter Gannon, Her Majesty's Inspectorate.

The committee will start work very shortly and report within about a year. Its terms of reference are to recommend:

a model of the English language, whether spoken or written, which would:

(i) serve as the basis of how teachers are trained to understand how the English language works;

(ii) inform professional discussion of all aspects of English teaching;

the principles which should guide teachers on how far and in what ways the model should be made explicit to pupils, to make them conscious of how language is used in a range of contexts;

what, in general terms, pupils need to know about how the English language works, and in consequence what they should have been taught, and be expected to understand, on this score at age 7, 11 and 16.

Capital Allocations

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the capital allocation for 1987-88 of all the local education authorities which received more than Bradford metropolitan district council.

Mr. Dunn: The allocations for education prescribed capital expenditure which were larger than that made to Bradford metropolitan district council were:

Local education authority	Allocation £'000
Inner London Education Authority	14,957
Essex	11,600
Hampshire	10,918
Humberside	10,753
Derbyside	9,036
Manchester	8,968
Staffordshire	7,591
Kent	7,514
Gloucestershire	7,167

TRANSPORT

Chinook Helicopter Accident

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the accidents investigation branch report on the accident to the Chinook helicopter BV 234LR G-BISO 2 May 1984 to be published.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The accidents investigation branch report on this accident is going through the legal processes required before publication. It is expected that this report will be published during the summer of this year.

Concrete Roads (Noise Levels)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps are being taken to reduce noise levels emanating from newly constructed major roads with concrete surfaces.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is the Department's policy to take noise protection measures where traffic on newly constructed roads, whether concrete or bituminous, causes noise to rise above specified levels. Local highway authorities act similarly. Studies by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory show that concrete and bituminous road surfaces result in similar noise levels when textured to provide similar skidding resistance.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all the public bodies for which he is responsible on which the consideration of the appointment or co-option of a person with knowledge of disability is a statutory requirement; if he will name the persons so appointed or co-opted on each body; and if he will indicate which of those persons is a person with a disability.

Mr. Moore: The Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee is the only such body for which I am responsible. I am required, as far as is reasonably practicable, to secure that at least half of the membership of the committee consists of persons who are disabled. Currently there are 20 members, of whom 11 are disabled. I do not think it appropriate to identify the members with disabilities.

The members of the Committee are:
Sir Peter Baldwin (Chairman).
Peter Large Joint Committee on Mobility for the Disabled.
Joe Hennessy Disabled Drivers' Association.
Adrian Stokes Disabled Drivers Motor Club.
Bert Massie Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation.
Trevor Meadows National Advisory Unit for Community Transport.
Sally Greengross Age Concern.
James Ross MENCAP.
James Elder-Woodward Strathclyde Regional Council.
Clive Davis Royal National Institute for the Deaf.
Jill Allen National Federation of the Blind.
Bob Ley South Wales Transport (retired).
Bill Buchanan British Railways Board.
Claudia Flanders Transport and Disability Consultant.
Robert Taylor Birmingham Airport Ltd.
Leslie Stephenson Townsend Thoresen.
Cliff Twort Transport and General Workers Union.
John Dobinson Access Committee for England.
John Hannam MP All Party Disablement Group.
Allan Beard Access to the Skies Committee.
Keith Brown London Regional Transport.

Manchester Airport (Accident)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport if the chief inspector of accidents has now submitted his report on the accident to the Boeing 737 at Manchester airport on 22 August 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The report of the investigation into the accident to Boeing 737 G-BGJL which occurred at Manchester airport on 22 August 1985 is now being completed by the inspector prior to the commencement of the legal processes, including consideration of representations by persons whose reputations might be adversely affected. Publication will take place as soon as possible, but is unlikely to be before late summer.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Drug Trafficking

117. Mr. Dickens asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in combating drug trafficking.

118. Dr. Blackburn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in combating drug trafficking.

119. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in combating drug trafficking.

120. Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in combating drug trafficking.

Mr. Hurd: On 20 October I chaired a meeting of Community Ministers in London at which it was agreed that the Community and its member states have a major role to play in stepping up the fight against drug abuse.

Agreement was reached upon a seven-point plan which would be pursued in conjunction with the Council of Europe's Pompidou Group, covering:

(i) Measures to reduce demand for drugs especially among young people;

(ii) Measures to improve the treatment of addicts and rehabilitation services;

(iii) ensuring that bilateral and Community aid supports as appropriate a recipient country's efforts to combat drug abuse;

(iv) steps to ensure that legislation takes account of the need to maintain effective control over illicit drug trafficking, particularly at the Community's external frontiers;

(v) mutual enforcement of confiscation orders relating to drug traffickers' assets;

(vi) enhanced co-operation between law enforcement agencies involving exchange of drug liaison officers between member states, the posting of drug liaison officers to other countries and the establishment of a worldwide directory of those involved in the fight against drug abuse; this would be achieved by inviting the Trevi Working Group Three to examine the scope for creating a co-ordinated network of drug liaison officers to monitor developments in producer countries;

(vii) preparation of joint assessments by Community ambassadors in drug-producing countries in order to ensure a steady flow of recommendations for action by the Twelve.

At the European Council, in December, Heads of State and Government endorsed this plan, action on which will be carried forward in ad hoc meetings of officials under the Belgian presidency. A copy of the Council's conclusions has been placed in the Library.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners on remand are currently being held in police cells.

Mr. Mellor: On 16 January 1987 there were 197 persons held in police cells in England and Wales, most of whom are likely to have been untried.

Airey Neave (Murder)

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, the case being concluded, he will now answer the question of the right hon. Member for South Down, Official Report, column 532, 6 November 1986.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand that, as part of an operation which led to the conviction of two men for conspiracy to murder, two detectives represented themselves as members of a terrorist organisation. I am informed that the police made an apology in court for any distress caused to the family of the late Mr. Airey Neave.

Immigration

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current monthly rate of representations by hon. Members in immigration cases; and how it compares with the rate prior to the introduction of his March 1986 guidelines.

Mr. Waddington: The following table gives the number of immigration files created each month since October 1985 as a result of representations made on immigration matters by right hon. and hon. Members.

October	1,782
November	1,552
December	1,044
1986
January	1,403
February	1,434
March	1,355
April	1,318
May	1,202
June	1,728
July	1,279
August	1,255
September	1,745
October	1,822
November	1,568
December	1,402

Notes:

1. These figures include a number of letters dealing with general issues rather than individual cases.
2. Representations made on behalf of a single family may be counted as more than one case where the immigration circumstances of more than one member of the family are under consideration.
3. Further representations made after reply has been sent are included separately in these figures.
4. Representations received about the same case from more than one right hon. Member or hon. Member are counted separately.
5. These figures include representations on after entry cases as well as those arising from port refusals where stops on removal were followed by written representations.
6. The figures relate to the months in which the representations were received. Those for November and December 1986 include substantial numbers of representations on behalf of passengers who were granted temporary admission in October and who were subsequently refused leave to enter after they had been further interviewed by immigration officers.
7. The guidelines to which my hon. and learned Friend refers were introduced on 1 May 1986.

Official Information

Mr. Michael Meacher asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish a complete list of statutory provisions bearing upon the disclosure of official information, other than the Official Secrets Acts, in order to update the list of provisions published in appendix V of the Franks report.

EMPLOYMENT

EC (Job Growth)

121. Mr. Charles Wardle asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in encouraging the growth of jobs throughout the European Community.

124. Sir Bernard Braine asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in encouraging the growth of jobs throughout the European Community.

125. Mr. Batiste asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in encouraging the growth of jobs throughout the European Community.

Mr. Lee: The progress made was considerable. In particular, at the Labour and Social Affairs Council on 11

December the Council adopted an action programme for employment growth, based on a text put forward by the United Kingdom, Italy and the republic of Ireland. The action programme sets the four priorities for the Labour and Social Affairs Council's future work as being the promotion of new business and employment growth; more efficient labour markets; better training for young people and adults; and more help for long term unemployed people.

First proposals under the programme are to be brought forward before the Council's next meeting. The European Commission will in addition be making six-monthly reports to the Council and the European Parliament on progress made in the programme's implementation. For a more detailed account of the action programme I refer my hon. Friends to my right hon. and learned Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) on 15 December 1986, at column 368.

In addition to the adoption of the action programme, achievements during the United Kingdom presidency in a number of other areas will also contribute substantially to the growth of jobs throughout the Community. Particular examples are the substantial progress made towards the completion of the internal market and towards lightening the burdens on business arising from Community obligations.

Small Businesses

122. Mr. Lord asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in encouraging the growth of smaller businesses throughout the European Community.

123. Mr. Thurnham asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in encouraging the growth of smaller businesses throughout the European Community.

124. Mr. Hind asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in encouraging the growth of smaller businesses throughout the European Community.

Mr. Lee: The European Community approved the broad principles of an action programme for small and medium-sized enterprises at the Industry Council on 20 October 1986. They adopted a resolution recognising the important role of SMEs in job creation and calling for a Community strategy for SMEs to complement national action. The programme's two main aims are to create a favourable environment for SMEs and to develop specific measures to improve their effectiveness, efficiency and access to finance. The programme provides a framework for the activities of the Commission's SME task force. It identifies the areas in which they will develop proposals in more detail including the reduction of burdens on businesses; ensuring that European Community policies relating to taxation, company law, competition, and the internal market are developed with due regard to the needs and interests of SMEs; ensuring that SMEs have access to European Community assistance through, for example, the European social fund and research and development programmes; setting up information centres to improve SMEs' understanding and awareness of European Community programmes and policies; and improving SMEs' access to advice, training and finance.

In a separate set of conclusions the Industry Council of 20 October emphasised the priority that it attaches to reducing fiscal, administrative and legal constraints on business, particularly SMEs, so as to encourage enterprise and promote employment.

On 17 November 1986 the Economic and Finance Council reached agreement on the substance of a new lending facility for SMEs. One and a half billion ecu (about £1·1 billion) will be made available in two equal tranches, the first to be raised by the Commission, the second by the European Investment Bank.

The Council has already begun discussion of a Commission proposal for a Council directive on the application of value added tax to SMEs. The proposals include provisions concerning the exemption limits below which small businesses are not required to be registered for VAT, and a simplified scheme to be made available for all businesses whose annual turnover does not exceed 150,000 ECU (about £110,000).

In addition, the Labour and Social Affairs Council on 11 December adopted and action programme on employment growth which sets out the formation of new businesses and employment growth as one of the priority areas of its future work. The programme calls for the rapid implementation of the SME action programme as endorsed by the Industry Council and for support for the efforts being made within member states to encourage the setting up and expansion of SMEs and one-man businesses in particular through the removal of unnecessary administrative constraints and a review of existing Community legislation to remove obstacles to the number of people taking up self-employment.

Community Programme

Mr. Leighton asked the Paymaster General how much the community programme will cost in the current year (a) gross and (b) net.

Mr. Lee: The current cash limit for the community programme is £1,061·8 million. This is £5 million lower than the initial cash limit, reflecting a take-up of the scheme which has been slightly lower than expected.

The net cost of the programme is about £440 million, some 40 per cent. of gross costs.

Mr. Leighton asked the Paymaster General what efforts are made, and to what extent it is a specific part of the objects of the community programme, to place participants in a job at the end of their 12 months.

Mr. Lee: A principal aim of the community programme is to help unemployed people secure permanent employment. Many sponsors provide training in job search skills and participants are granted time off with pay to visit their local jobcentre and attend interviews with local employers.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement about proposed reductions in community programme plans in 1987-88; and if he will provide a breakdown of the reductions as between the voluntary sector and the private sector for each of the Manpower Services Commission areas.

Mr. Lee: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Parry asked the Paymaster General when he expects the Aigburth and Lark Lane community care project, details of which have been sent to him by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside, to be approved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Proposals for projects under the community programme are considered by the appropriate local office of the Manpower Services Commission with the advice of the area manpower board. I understand that, in this case, a formal proposal has not yet been put forward by the Aigburth and Lark Lane community care project to the local office of the Manpower Services Commission. The details sent by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside are insufficient for the Commission to reach a decision.

Mr. Parry asked the Paymaster General if he is satisfied with the working of the community programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Yes, I am very satisfied with the operation of the community programme, which is providing worthwhile work experience for 300,000 unemployed people each year on projects which bring benefit to the community. Survey evidence shows that around a third of those who take part go straight from the programme into employment or training and about half will have had at least one job or training within 12 months of leaving.

Mr. Parry asked the Paymaster General if he will list in the Official Report the Manpower Services Commission community programmes in the city of Liverpool at the latest date; and how many are employed on each project.

Mr. Lee: A table listing the number of community programme agencies and independent sponsored projects administered by the Manpower Services Commission's Merseyside inner community programme area office, and the number employed on each is as follows. The information was collated on 16 January 1987.

Centres for the Unemployed

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General what is his Department's policy with regard to the extension of existing centres for the unemployed.

Mr. Lee: The Manpower Services Commission funds a number of posts in centres for the unemployed through the community programme. There are no plans to increase the support for these centres.

Availability for Work Scheme

Mr. Park asked the Paymaster General (1) what has been the number of people interviewed by his officials in Coventry as part of the project to see which people are available for work;

(2) what is the number of people over the age of 50 years who have been interviewed by his officials in Coventry as part of the availability for work scheme;

(3) what is the number of (a) male and (b) female disabled people who have been interviewed by his officials in Coventry as part of the availability for work scheme;

(4) how many people living in Coventry have been refused benefit after being interviewed by his officials under his availability for work test.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: As I announced on 28 October, we are introducing improved procedures to establish the long-standing requirement that benefit should only be paid to unemployed claimants who are available for work in accordance with long-standing legal rules. These better procedures were introduced in the Coventry unemployment benefit offices on 10 November 1986.

At 26 December 1986, the latest date for which information is available, 3,957 new claimants in Coventry had completed the availability questionnaire. Of these, six people have had their claims disallowed by the independent adjudicating authorities because they are not available for work and a further 53 cases are still under consideration. Our records do not separately distinguish sex, age, whether a claimant is disabled or whether it has been necessary to interview a claimant.

Disabled People

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Paymaster General if, pursuant to his answer of 19 November 1986, Official Report, column 213, schemes providing vocational training for disabled people, combined with a substantial degree of adaptation of workplaces, are now eligible for support from the European social fund if they are in priority areas of the country.

Mr. Lee: The European Commission's guidelines for applications to the European social fund in 1987 removed the specific priority allocated to vocational training for disabled people combined with a substantial degree of adaption of workplaces. However, priority was retained for operations in priority areas for disabled people capable of working in the open labour market. As a result any schemes in priority areas which would have been eligible under the 1986 guidelines should still qualify under the 1987 guidelines. However, the final interpretation of the guidelines rests with the European Commission.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Paymaster General if support from the European social fund is available for vocational training of disabled people only if schemes are in priority areas.

Mr. Lee: The specific social fund guideline which accords priority to operations for disabled people capable of working in the open labour market is restricted to priority regions. However, the final interpretation of this guideline rests with the European Commission which has in the past been prepared to support under it some operations for disabled people taking place outside the priority regions so long as those taking part are residents of priority regions. In addition, disabled people may also be eligible to benefit from other employment and training programmes supported by the social fund under other of the fund's guidelines not specifically directed towards helping the disabled.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Paymaster General if he has any intention to seek to amend the restrictions on eligibility of projects for disabled people under European social fund guidelines.

Mr. Lee: Yes. The next opportunity will be at a meeting of the European Social Fund Advisory Committee, due to take place next month at which representatives of my Department will put forward the case for extending the availability of support for disabled people under the guidelines of the European social fund. Final decisions on the guidelines rest with the European Commission.

Tobacco Industry

Mr. Parry asked the Paymaster General if he will list the number of job losses in the United Kingdom tobacco industry by regions since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The precise information requested is not available. However, estimates related to the tobacco industry in Great Britain showed a net loss of 15,000 employees in employment between September 1979 and September 1986, the latest date for which figures are available.

The available regional employment estimates for the industry are from censuses of employment taken in September 1981 and September 1984. Between these dates, there was a net loss of 2,200 employees employed in the tobacco industry in the south-east region and no reduction in the northern region. Figures for other regions cannot be given without disclosing confidential information about individual concerns; the 1984 census estimates for Northern Ireland are not yet available. The reduction between the two census dates in the total number employed in the industry in Great Britain was 6,800.

Mr. Parry asked the Paymaster General how many persons were employed in the tobacco industry in the United Kingdom at the latest date; and what were the figures in 1979.

Mr. Lee: The estimated number of employees in employment in the tobacco industry in Great Britain are as follows:

Date	Employees in Employment (thousands)
June 1979	31·0
September 1986	16·5

These estimates are subject to considerable potential estimation error due to the relatively small number of employees in the industry. Comparison between the figures for June and September could be affected by seasonal factors. Estimates are not available for Northern Ireland.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Overseas Aid (Legal Systems)

100. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of his Department toward aid projects in Commonwealth countries funded by third countries which have as their goal the overhaul of the legal system.

Mr. Chris Patten: Independent Commonwealth countries exercise their sovereign rights in overhauling their legal systems and can seek advice and assistance from whatever source they deem appropriate. We are ready to consider any request to provide advice or assistance on legal matters.

United Nations Relief and Works Agency

101. Mr. White asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the direct British contribution has yet been paid to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency; what information he has on the payment of contributions by Arab states; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The 1986 contribution of £5 million has been paid. A further £5 million has been pledged for 1987 and will be paid during the course of the year.

For information on the payment of contributions by Arab states, I refer the hon. Member to annex I of the addendum to the report of the Commissioner General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency of October 1986, UN Official Record No. A/41/13/Add1, copies of which have been deposited in the Library of the House.

PRIME MINISTER

Television Licences

Mr. Kaufman asked the Prime Minister how many television sets there are in 10 Downing street; where they are located; and who pays the licence fee for each of them.

The Prime Minister: Thirteen television sets are currently in use at 10 Downing street. No licence fees are payable for television sets on Crown property used for Government purposes.

ENERGY

Nuclear Safety

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what records are being made of any accidents, incidents or untoward occurrences involving a flask containing spent nuclear fuel where the events did not meet the criteria for an incident notifiable to Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what emergency plans have been approved by Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate in respect of accidents involving flasks containing spent nuclear fuel; whether separate emergency plans, or sections of plans, have been approved in respect of flasks containing damaged, distorted or failed nuclear fuel elements; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what are the reporting criteria for an incident notifiable to Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate in relation to an accident, incident, or untoward occurrence involving a flask containing spent nuclear fuel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The emergency plans approved by Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate of the Health and Safety Executive for all licensed nuclear installations include provision for dealing with any flask incident on site, as do the plans of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority.

Accidents, incidents and untoward occurrences, including any involving flasks, at a licensed nuclear installation are required to be recorded in a formal register, available at all times for inspection by HMNII. If any such event causes significant radiological exposure, or shows that the safe operation or condition of the plant may be affected, the licence terms require that the Health and Safety Executive be formally notified as soon as practicable. The UKAEA also has arrangements for providing full information on any such event to HMNII.

The Secretary of State for Transport is responsible for regulations governing flasks in transit outside nuclear sites.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will now make available for independent assessment all the details of the incident at Windscale involving radioactive contamination of a worker on 27 March 1981, and all the documents relating to subsequent inquiries;

(2) if he will now make available for independent assessment all the details of the incident at Sellafield involving radioactive contamination on 18 June 1981, and all the documents relating to subsequent inquiries;

(3) if he will now make available for independent assessment all the details of the radiation contamination incident at Sellafield reported to the nuclear installation inspectorate on 13 November 1984.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer the hon. Member to the answer already given to him on 8 December 1986 at columns 5-6.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list all the public bodies for which he is responsible on which the consideration of the appointment or co-option of a person with knowledge of disability is a statutory requirement; if he will name the persons so appointed or co-opted on each body; and if he will indicate which of those persons is a person with a disability.

Mr. Peter Walker: There are no such statutory requirements relating to the public bodies for which I am responsible. British Coal, the area electricity boards, BNFL and the UKAEA ll included references in their latest annual reports indicating their willingness to employ disabled people.

Generating Plant

Mr. McGuire asked the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions have taken place in recent years between his Department and the Central Electricity Generating Board on (a) the criteria determining a merit order of operation of generating plant, (b) management policies with consequences for the merit order of operation of generating plant and (c) accounting and investment policies with consequences for the merit order of operation of generating plant; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: My Department has regular discussions with the Electricity Council about the general financial framework for the electricity supply industry, and with the Central Electricity Generating Board about the board's capital development programme. Subject to these, the management and operation of the generating system, including the determination of the merit order, are matters for the CEGB.

Mr. McGuire asked the Secretary of State for Energy what account is taken of the likely merit order of operation of generating plant, and of possible changes in that merit order during plant lifetime, in considering investment approval for a new power station; what information on such matters is provided to his Department by the Central Electricity Generating Board; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The Central Electricity Generating Board now informs my Department of the net effective cost of a proposed new power station. The calculation of the NEC takes into account the expected position in the merit order of the new station throughout its expected operating life.

Coal-fired Power Stations

Mr. McGuire asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish a list of coal-fired power stations of gross capability 100 MW or more showing for each station (a) the date investment approval was given, (b) the net effective cost per kilowatt per year as calculated at the time investment approval was given, (c) what availability factor or load factor was used in the net effective cost calculation at that time, (d) the load factor achieved in the last year and (e) the present position in the Central Electricity Generating Board merit order of operation.

Mr. Goodlad: I shall ask the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board to write to the hon. Member.

Bioethanol

Mr. Knowles asked the Secretary of State for Energy what research has been carried out into the feasibility, cost-effectiveness and environmental implications of using bioethanol as a substitute for lead in petrol; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Studies have been carried out and several international seminars held, on the use of bioethanol as substitute for lead as an octane booster in petrol. All have concluded that there are cheaper alternatives. However, the energy technology support unit at Harwell is carrying out a detailed study on the cost of production of ethanol from various biomass sources. Its report is expected to be published towards the end of this year.

Nuclear Accidents (Convention)

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Energy if Her Majesty's Government have signed the International Atomic Energy Authority's convention on assistance in the case of a nuclear accident or nuclear emergency adopted on 26 September 1986; when her Majesty's Government expect to ratify it; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 20 January 1987.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Aylesbury Crown Court

Mr. Baldry asked the Attorney-General what is the average time taken by Aylesbury Crown court to pay counsel's fees; and what is the present number of fee notes outstanding there.

The Attorney-General: In standard fee cases about one week. In other cases on average between four to six weeks. The number of fee notes outstanding is about 116.

Legal Aid

Mr. Lawrence asked the Attorney-General if he will list the extensions made to the availability of legal aid since May 1979.

The Attorney-General: The extensions to the availability of publicly funded legal services under the legal aid scheme since May 1979 are as follows:

1 December 1982: Assistance by way of representation (ABWOR) extended to provide legally aided representation before mental health review tribunals;

1 May 1983: ABWOR extended to cover representation for parents in child care proceedings;

24 May 1983: Legal aid extended to applications for bail to the Crown court where bail has been refused by the magistrates' court;

3 October 1983: Introduction of the statutory scheme to provide access to legal advice at magistrates' courts (the "magistrates' court duty solicitor scheme");

1 April 1984: ABWOR extended to prison disciplinary hearings;

27 May 1984: Legal aid extended to cover representation for parents in child care proceedings; (The extension of ABWOR announced on 1 May 1983 thus became redundant);

1 January 1986: ABWOR extended to hearings requesting warrants of further detention under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act;

1 January 1986: Introduction of the statutory scheme to provide access to legal advice for those detained by the police (the "24-hour duty solicitor scheme").

The Lord Chancellor also announced on 17 February 1986 that the following extensions to the legal aid schemes would be made as resources permit:

(a) an extension of the legal advice and assistance scheme to allow solicitors, in some circumstances, to visit the housebound to provide legal advice;

(b) an extension of ABWOR to cover proceedings under section 47 of the National Assistance Act 1948;

(c) an extension of ABWOR to cover applications under section 28(6) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969.

In addition, since May 1979, the financial limits governing eligibility for legal aid have been raised on six occasions.

Mr. McNamara asked the Attorney-General how many letters have been received by the Lord Chancellor's Department and the No. 9 legal aid north-eastern area from (a) the Law Society on local law societies, (b) individual firms of solicitors or (c) members of the general public alleging delays in the processing of legal aid cases in the No. 9 north-eastern region.

The Attorney-General: So far as can be ascertained, the Lord Chancellor's Department has received no letters relating specifically to delays in processing legal aid applications in No. 9 area office. The Law Society's legal aid head office is aware of one complaint from a firm of solicitors. No. 9 area itself receives a number of inquiries about the progress of individual applications, some of which could be classed as complaints about delays, but no detailed records are kept. The area director regularly informs local law societies of the current position regarding the workload of the office.

Mr. McNamara asked the Attorney-General what is the average time it takes to process legal aid applications in the No. 9 north-eastern area.

The Attorney-General: The latest figures available are published in appendix 2G of the 36th legal aid annual reports. These show that, for legal aid area No. 9, it took an average 77·24 days (actual, not working) from receipt of a legal aid application to the issue of a certificate during financial year 1985-86.

Mr. McNamara asked the Attorney-General why officers in the No. 9 legal aid north-eastern region have been instructed not to receive telephone calls from solicitors concerning individual applications for legal aid.

The Attorney-General: This is a matter for the legal aid administration of the Law Society which is responsible for the operation of the civil legal aid scheme.

Mr. McNamara asked the Attorney-General what estimate he has made of the effects on the conduct of cases and the time at which solicitors are instructed of the delays in granting legal aid applications in the No. 9 north-eastern area.

The Attorney-General: The length of time taken to process legal aid applications in No. 9 legal aid area is below the national average. In cases of genuine urgency, where an immediate decision is necessary, emergency legal aid can be granted.

Mr. McNamara asked the Attorney-General how many executive officers are currently employed at the legal aid No. 9 north-eastern area; what is the nominal establishment; and whether the Lord Chancellor has any plans to increase the number of executive officers to overcome the current backlog of work in the area.

The Attorney-General: Staffing levels in the individual area offices are the responsibility of the legal aid administration of the Law Society. I understand that two senior executive officers and two executive officers are currently employed at the No. 9 legal aid area office. There is no formal establishment figure, but four vacancies have occurred recently. Subject to the completion of internal training programmes, it is expected that these will be filled later this year.

Mr. McNamara asked the Attorney-General whether he will itemise the main heads of work in the legal aid No. 9 north-eastern area, indicating those heads where the work load has increased and those where it has reduced for each year over the past three years to the end of 1986.

The Attorney-General: The main areas of work dealt with in all legal aid area offices are:

Civil legal aid applications
Applications for assistance by way of representation (ABWOR)
Applications for extensions of the advice and assistance (green form) initial cost limit
Assessment and payment of civil legal aid bills
Assessment and payment of magistrates' court criminal legal aid bills
Assessment and payment of ABWOR bills
Assessment and payment of green form bills
Assessment and payment of duty solicitor bills

Figures showing the volume of work in each of these categories by individual area offices are not available.

However, on a national basis the volume of work in each of these categories has altered over the past three years as follows:

Civil applications	283,806	366,269
Green form extensions	147,434	239,960
ABWOR applications	80,786	82,993
Civil legal aid bills	148,077	182,463
Magistrates court criminal bills	322,813	371,452
ABWOR bills	60,743	60,667
Green form bills	733,410	1,038,805

No comparison is possible for duty solicitor bills since the duty solicitor schemes were introduced after 1982-83.

Mr. McNamara asked the Attorney-General (1) why overtime has been banned at the No. 9 north-eastern legal aid offices;

(2) why no temporary officers, clerical or other grades, have been employed at the offices of the No. 9 north-eastern legal aid area in order to reduce the backlog of work.

The Attorney-General: This is a matter for the legal aid administration of the Law Society.

Recorders

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Attorney-General whether the figures given by him in his reply to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy on 16 December 1986, Official Report, column 431, refer to both recorders and assistant recorders or only to recorders.

The Attorney-General: To recorders only. The statutory provisions have no application to assistant recorders.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Attorney-General in how many cases since May 1979 the Lord Chancellor has not renewed the appointments of recorders of the Crown court who were citizens of the Republic of Ireland.

The Attorney-General: The information requested is not available. The Act of Settlement requires that a recorder should be a British subject. No inquiries are made as to the possibility of dual nationality.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Attorney-General in how many of the 27 cases referred to in his reply to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy on 16 December 1986, Official Report, column 431, the Lord Chancellor declined to extend the particular recorder's appointments because he was not satisfied.

The Attorney-General: According to the information available, in at least seven cases.

SCOTLAND

Medical Statistics (Black Inquiry)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will update the medical statistics in his Department's submission to the inquiry under the chairmanship of Sir Douglas Black as published in The Lancet on 26 May 1984 to include the figures for 1982-84 and with special reference to the statistics for postal districts in the south-west of Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: Additions to the tables submitted to Sir Douglas Black's inquiry by the Common Services Agency for the Scottish Health Service are at tables 1 and 2.

Table 1: Registrations (and average annual registration rates per 100,000) of leukaemia in the 0-24 age group in selected areas of Scotland 1982-84.

AIDS

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice has been issued to prisoners about the implications for the spread of AIDS through the shared use of wet razors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: There should be no occasion for the shared use of razors in Scottish penal establishments since each inmate is issued with a disposable or safety razor for his personal use. Guidelines on AIDS issued to prison staff make it clear that razors should not be shared. The AIDS leaflets which are currently being issued to members of the public and which include a warning against sharing razors will shortly be made available to inmates in penal establishments.

Radioactivity Accidents (Police Training)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Strathclyde as to what training, for each division of the Strathclyde police force, police officers have received to deal with accidents involving radioactivity, as to the exercises each division carries out to deal with such accidents and as to the intervals at which such exercises take place;

(2) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Strathclyde as to what exercises, for each division of Strathclyde police force, police officers have taken part in to prepare themselves for (i) an accident involving radioactive contamination and (ii) evacuation of the population in the event of a worst case nuclear reactor disaster under adverse meteorological conditions, over the last five years.

Mr. Lang: I understand from the chief constable that it is not the policy of Strathclyde police to train personnel on a divisional basis to deal with accidents involving radioactivity. Fully trained police personnel are, however, available at any time to attend and direct force operations in the event of such an accident, and contingency plans prepared by the emergencies planning section of the force are retained within each division.

Similarly, exercises in dealing with this type of accident are not undertaken divisionally, but some divisions have gained experience through participating in exercises organised by agencies other than the police, including the exercises held in each of the past five years by the South of Scotland Electricity Board in relation to the emergency plan for the Hunterston power station. In this context, the police contingency plan for evacuation of the population in the event of a worst case nuclear reactor disaster has been exercised on a simulated basis.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Strathclyde as to the number, for each division of the Strathclyde police force, of (i) dosimeters, (ii) radiac survey meters, (iii) sets of protective clothing, (iv) breathing units and (v) decontamination units possessed or available for use;

(2) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Strathclyde as to what items of equipment, for each division of Strathclyde police force, are available for police use in an accident involving radioactive contamination.

Mr. Lang: I understand from the chief constable that, although equipment for use in an accident involving radioactive contamination is not held by the force on a divisional basis, 36 dosimeters and 22 radiac survey meters are held centrally for training purposes.

The force does not hold sets of protective clothing, breathing units or decontamination units for this purpose, but the national arrangements for dealing with incidents involving radioactivity (the NAIR scheme) provides for the involvement, where necessary, of other services, including the fire service and hospitals, with access to them.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all the public bodies for which he is responsible on which the consideration of the appointment or co-option of a person with knowledge of disability is a statutory requirement; if he will name the persons so appointed or co-opted on each body; and if he will indicate which of those persons is a person with a disability.

Mr. Rifkind: I shall reply to the right hon. Member as soon as possible.

Inverclyde Initiative

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received concerning the Inverclyde initiative; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend has recently had representations from Inverclyde district council and from the development group of the Inverclyde initiative about the continuing economic problems of the area. These are being considered urgently in consultation with the Scottish Development Agency. My right hon. and learned Friend is to meet a delegation from Inverclyde on 23 January.

Inshore Fisheries Act

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what consultations he undertook in pursuance of the Inshore Fisheries Act 1984 prior to laying before the House the Prohibition of Carriage of Monofilament Gill Nets (Scotland) Order 1986.

Mr. John MacKay: Consultations were undertaken with a number of salmon and sea fisheries organisations. The Commission of the European Communities was also consulted and confirmed that the order was compatible with Community law and in conformity with the common fisheries policy.

WALES

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all the public bodies for which he is responsible on which the consideration of the appointment or co-option of a person with knowledge of disability is a statutory requirement; if he will name the persons so appointed or co-opted on each body; and if he will indicate which of those persons is a person with a disability.

Mr. Mark Robinson: There are no statutory requirements to appoint or co-opt persons with knowledge of disability in relation to the public bodies to which my right hon. Friend makes appointments.

Health Authorities (Cost Cutting)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether any of the cost cutting exercises by the Welsh health authorities in the last financial year for which figures are available have affected patient attendances.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The in-patient, day cases and out-patient activity of Welsh health authorities for the last two financial years for which figures are available is shown in the table:

	1984-85	1985-86	Percentage increase	1984-85	1985-86	Percentage increase

Welsh Language

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the Welsh Joint Education Committee about Welsh language education development; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Following a series of discussions I have had with representatives of the WJEC in recent months, I am pleased to report that the WJEC has accepted my right hon. Friend's invitation to play a more active part in Welsh language education and has decided to appoint a Welsh Language Education Development Committee for this purpose.

The development committee will have a major role to play in helping to ensure that available resources are effectively used by promoting better co-ordination and sharing of information, and as a source of informed advice to both central and local government on policies and on priorities for future development.

The committee will include representatives from all sectors of the education service, including the University of Wales and the voluntary bodies. Its support costs are being met by the Welsh Office through the WJEC. Our officials are in close touch with WJEC officers on the administrative aspects, so that the committee can be enabled to commence its work without delay.

I greatly welcome the decision of the WJEC to enlarge its role in Welsh language education and I hope that all concerned will support the development committee in its important work.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

USA (Tariff Negotiations)

102. Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in resolving tariff difficulties with the United States of America.

104. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in resolving tariff difficulties with the United States of America.

107. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in resolving tariff difficulties with the United States of America.

110. Sir Alex Fletcher asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in resolving tariff difficulties with the United States of America.

Mr. Alan Clark: At the beginning of the United Kingdom presidency there were several trade disputes outstanding between the United States and the Community: more have since arisen through measures taken in the autumn by the last Congress which discriminate against the United State's overseas trade partners. A dispute about the treatment of citrus products and pasta has been settled satisfactorily to both sides. The Community continues urgently to seek a solution to the major dispute with the United States over the terms of its enlargement. In respect of a number of other disputes the Community proposes to use to the full its rights to seek consultations and if necessary redress in GATT.

EC (Internal Market)

103. Sir Reginald Eyre asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in completing the internal market.

105. Mr. Harvey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in completing the internal market.

106. Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in completing the internal market.

108. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in completing the internal market.

Mr. Alan Clark: During the United Kingdom presidency (July-December 1986) the Council adopted or agreed 48 individual measures which will help remove barriers to trade in the Community. This represents a substantial acceleration in progress towards completing the internal market and the number of measures adopted is considerably higher than during any previous presidency.

Details of 41 measures were given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in an answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend East (Mr. Taylor), on 19 December 1986, at columns 765-68. I provided details of the seven remaining measures in an answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery). 12 January 1987, at column 5.

Japan (Trade Surpluses)

109. Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in maintaining pressure on Japan to act to reduce trade surpluses.

111. Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in maintaining pressures on Japan to act to reduce trade surpluses.

112. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in maintaining pressures on Japan to act to reduce trade surpluses.

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's Presidency of the European Community to maintain pressures on Japan to act to reduce trade surplus.

Mr. Alan Clark: Under the presidency of the United Kingdom the European Community strongly pressed Japan to improve market access through the early implementation of appropriate macro-economic policies and the removal of non-tariff barriers. Discriminatory taxes on imported alcoholic drinks, including Scotch Whisky, became a test case of Japanese intentions, but their concessions announced in December did not go far enough. The Community is therefore continuing to pursue against Japan its GATT case on this particular issue, launched during the United Kingdom presidency. Discussions with the Japanese Government on other current problems continue.

Film Production

Mr. Jack Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he proposes to take any action to stimulate more effective investment in British film production; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: The Government maintain their view that the provisions of the Films Act 1985 offer a framework within which the commercial film industry can develop and prosper. So far, seven films have been supported under the film production scheme operated by British Screen Finance Ltd. and five projects have received finance under the development scheme managed by the national film development fund. A short films scheme is intended to be in place soon.

National Maritime Institute

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his discussions with the Institution of Professional Civil Servants on employment and pension rights at the National Maritime Institute.

Mr. Butcher: In August 1982 the Minister for Industry and Information Technology met the trade unions side, including representatives of the Institution of Professional Civil Servants, to discuss the terms and conditions of service of civil servants working at the National Maritime Institute. There were also other meetings with officials. As a result it was agreed that NMI Ltd. would offer terms and conditions of employment which, taken as a whole, were not less favourable than those the civil servants then enjoyed.

International Tin Council

Mr. Brinton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what financial contributions have been made by his Department to the International Tin Council since 24 October 1985;

(2) for how long Her Majesty's Government intend to pay their share of the International Tin Council's administrative and legal costs;

(3) what are the proportions spent on legal fees and employment costs of cash contributed by Her Majesty's Government to the International Tin Council since 24 October 1985.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The United Kingdom Government will continue to pay their share of the administrative budget of the International Tin Council so long as it remains a member of the sixth international tin agreement.

The Government's contribution to the administrative account of the council for the year ended 30 June 1986 was £55,701 and is £76,117 for the current year. Details of the budget of the administrative account are confidential, but for obvious reasons the composition of the budget is affected by staff changes following the cessation of buffer stock operations and the legal actions brought against the council.

Torvinstyle Properties Ltd.

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what stage has been reached in the inquiries made by Mr. David Gorick of the Department of Trade and Industry, companies division, into Torvinstyle Properties Ltd., trading as Five Star Developments.

Mr. Howard: Torvinstyle Properties Ltd. was placed in creditors voluntary liquidation in August 1986. Inquiries have been concluded and the Department is considering the information obtained.

Rolls-Royce

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give further consideration to consultations with Rolls-Royce employees prior to privatisation.

Mr. Pattie: Consultation with the employees of Rolls-Royce remains a matter for the company.

Guinness plc

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to receive the report of his inspectors' investigations into the Guinness company; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The inspectors are pressing ahead with their investigation as quickly as possible, but I cannot say when their report will be received.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list all the public bodies for which he is responsible on which the consideration of the appointment or co-option of a person with knowledge of disability is a statutory requirement; if he will name the persons so appointed or co-opted on each body; and if he will indicate which of those persons is a person with a disability.

Mr. Butcher: Appointments to the Hearing Aid Council are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend under the Hearing Aid Council Act 1968, which requires that five of the 12 council members shall have either specialised medical knowledge of deafness and audiological technical knowledge or be capable of representing the interests of persons with impaired hearing. The persons presently appointed to these five posts are Dr. S. Bellman, Dr. D. N. Brooks, Mr. R. S. Eldridge, Mrs. M. B. Nobbs and Miss. A. Spokes; two of whom suffer from impaired hearing. Under the terms of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Act 1970 my right hon. Friend is required to consider the appointment of persons to represent the needs of the disabled in the transport users consultative committees, domestic coal consumers council, Post Office users councils, gas consumers council and electricity consultative councils. The following members of these bodies are disabled or have knowledge or experience of the disabled:

Mrs. R. Barwick North East England TUCC
Mr. J. Blezard North East England TUCC
Mr. S. Bradshaw London Regional Passengers' Committee
Mr. J. Cartledge London Regional Passengers' Committee
Mr. F. D. Cheese South Eastern ECC
Mr. M. Davey TUCC for Wales
Mr. D. M. Dempsey North East England TUCC
Mr. J. J. Eccles POUC for Northern Ireland
Rev. A. S. Hutchison POUC for Scotland
Mr. D. R. James Midlands ECC
Mrs. P. Lek Merseyside & North Wales EC
Mr. R. A. Morley Yorkshire ECC
Mrs. D. Rhodes TUCC for Southern England
Mrs. R. Sansom East Midlands ECC
Mrs. J. R. M. Searle Yorkshire ECC
Mrs. V. K. Studholme GCC
Mr. M. A. Sullivan Midlands TUCC

Tobacco Industry

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list in the Official Report information available to him on the tobacco factories which have closed in the United Kingdom each year since 1979.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No official statistics are collected on the number of factory closures in the tobacco industry. According to reports in the national press, the following tobacco factories have closed since 1979:

1979—None.
1980—None.
1981 — One cigarette factory (Carreras Rothmans, Rayleigh, Essex).
1982—None.
1983—Two cigarette factories (Imperial Tobacco Ltd., Stirling and Glasgow). One cigar factory (Imperial Tobacco, Bristol).
1984 — One cigarette factory (Carreras Rothmans, Basildon).
1985—Two cigarette factories (Gallaher, Middleton and Imperial Tobacco Ltd., Newcastle). One cigar factory (Gallaher, Lisnafillan, Northern Ireland).
1986 — One cigarette factory (Carreras Rothmans, Carrickfergus, Northern Ireland).

Mergers and Takeover Bids

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list all decisions taken by him since 1983 regarding reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission of a proposed takeover of a public company reported on by the Office of Fair Trading giving, in each case, his reasons for those decisions.

Mr. Howard: No. The total number of qualifying mergers (actual and proposed) reported on by the Office of Fair Trading to the Secretary of State from 1983 to 1986 are as follows:

1984: 259
1986: 313

It would be disproportionately costly to provide an itemised list of the 956 cases involved. Of these 956 cases, 31 were referred to the MMC. A list of these references, together with copies of the press notices announcing them, have been placed in the Library of both Houses.

Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress in his review of existing legislation with regard to mergers and takeover bids.

Mr. Howard: Work on the review is continuing. If changes of policy within the existing law are identified as desirable, the Government will not hesitate to implement them.

Insider Dealing

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the Government have any plans to seek to change the penalties for insider dealing.

Mr. Channon: Insider dealing is a serious offence which can do great damage to confidence in our financial institutions. We have decided that the maximum penalties should reflect this. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will therefore be bringing forward an amendment to the Criminal Justice Bill for consideration in Committee to increase the penalty for insider dealing to a maximum term of seven years imprisonment on conviction on indictment. Our commitment to vigorous enforcement will, if Parliament agrees, be backed up by penalties which fit the crime and provide an effective deterrent.

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to introduce new measures to curb insider dealing.

Mr. Howard: I would refer the hon. Member to my answer to the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) on 10 December 1986, at column 335, and to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) today.

Pilkington-BTR (Share Dealings)

Mr. Hind asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the dealings in the shares of Pilkington plc on 14 January in advance of his announcement that the BTR bid would not be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Channon: I understand that the stock exchange has been conducting a preliminary investigation into dealings in the shares of Pilkington on 14 January. Whilst inquiries are not yet complete, it has been established that the buying that day was widespread, chiefly by institutions overseas and in the United Kingdom. Nothing has yet been revealed which would suggest that dealings took place on the basis of leaking information. I understand that the stock exchange investigations are continuing and I expect that full results will be made available to me as soon as practicable.

Civil Servants (Inquiry)

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress of the inquiry which he announced on 18 December which followed allegations that public servants may have misused information; and whether any prosecutions are contemplated.

Mr. Channon: The inspectors have informed me that they have uncovered no evidence implicating any public official other than one junior official at the Office of Fair Trading in any illegal activity. Their inquiries are continuing, but the matter is complex and they do not expect to be able to report definitively for some weeks. The question of prosecution is for the Director of Public Prosecutions. The director is in contact with the inspectors and is keeping the matter under review in the light of the progress of their inquiries.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Retirement Pensioners

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the cost to the taxpayer of maintaining a retirement pensioner in a retirement home.

Mr. Viggers: The average cost in the year ended 31 March 1986 of maintaining a pensioner in a home for the elderly run by the health and social services boards was £139 per week. This excludes both capital and central administration costs.

Irish Language

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will specify what measures he is taking to promote the Irish language.

Mr. Scott: The Government responds to demand for the use of Irish through the education system and through support for the arts. Approximately 20,000 school pupils study Irish. 1,644 took 'O' Level and 269 'A' Level in 1986. Bunscoil Ghaelach, where teaching is wholly in Irish, is recognised as a grant-aided school by the Department of Education for Northern Ireland. A special Irish unit has been approved at Steelstown primary school, Londonderry. The Department of Education has a specialist Irish language school inspector. Colleges of further education and universities provide courses in Irish language and literature.

In addition, the Arts Council for Northern Ireland supports traditional cultural activities and Irish language publications of literary merit.

The Government are ready to consider other measures where an appropriate level of demand for the use of the Irish language is established.

Population Figures

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish population figures for Northern Ireland in 1983, broken down in the same way as the Great Britain figures published by the Department of Health and Social Security in table 6 of "Low Income Families 1983."

Mr. Viggers: The information is as follows:

Population total number of families and persons in Northern Ireland, 1983, classified by family type and economic status

	Number of Families	Number of Persons in Families
All Families	482	1,513
Total Families over Pension Age	153	285
Married Couples only	38	77
Single Persons only	68	68

	Number of Families	Number of Persons in Families
Other Pension Families containing non-pension Persons	47	140
Total Families under Pension Age, by Family Type	328	1,228
Married Couple with Children	146	664
Single Person with Children	19	72
Married Couple without Children	62	125
Single Person without Children	28	28
Other Adult Families	73	339
Of which large families (3 or more children)	31	205
Total Families under Pension Age, by Economic Status	328	1,228
Full-time work or Self-Employed	226	846
Sick or Disabled	24	83
Unemployed	49	200
Others	30	100

Notes:

1. Figures are based on the 1983 mid-year estimates of population and the Continuous Household Survey for 1983 (equivalent to the General Household Survey in Great Britain).
2. As the Continuous Household Survey was not extant prior to 1983, only 1983 figures are given.
3. As sample survey estimates have been 'factored up' to population levels the estimates do not logically admit to the assessment of statistical error.
4. The estimates of the numbers of families are based on the sample survey estimate of 3·14 persons per household.
5. The pensioner status of a household is based on the pensioner status of the head of household.
6. Children are persons under 16 years of age.
7. All figures have been rounded to the nearest 1,000, consequently summations may not necessarily equate exactly with totals.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list all the public bodies for which he is responsible on which the consideration of the appointment or co-option of a person with knowledge of disability is a statutory requirement; if he will name the persons so appointed or co-opted on each body; and if he will indicate which of those persons is a person with a disability.

Mr. Viggers: In relation to the following bodies, under section 9 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons (Northern Ireland) Act 1978, regard should be had in the appointment of members to the desirability of including one or more persons with experience of disabled persons and of their being disabled:

Youth Committee for Northern Ireland
Distinction and Meritorious Service Awards Committee
Northern Ireland Health and Social Services Council
Central Medical Advisory Committee
Central Nursing Advisory Committee
Central Dental Advisory Committee
Central Pharmaceutical Advisory Committee
Central Personal Social Services Advisory Committee
Poisons Board
Therapeutic Paramedical Advisory Committee
Clinical Imaging Services Advisory Committee
Clinical Engineering and Medical Physics Services Advisory Committee
Laboratory Services Advisory Committee
Committee for Nature Conservation
Ulster Countryside Committee
Historic Buildings Council
Historic Monuments Council
Northern Ireland Building Regulations Advisory Committee
Northern Ireland Water Council
Local Government Staff Commission
Committees for Employment of Disabled People

Information on the names of the persons so appointed and which of those persons may be disabled is not at present readily available and could be compiled only at disproportionate cost.

Prisoners (Maltreatment)

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what were the number of allegations of police maltreatment of prisoners held in their custody under the emergency provisions in Northern Ireland during the years 1975 to 1985 on a year by year basis; how many investigations were held; and how many of the allegations were upheld during the same years, again on a year by year basis.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 19 January 1987]: This information is not available in the form requested for 1975 to 1985. I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible giving the available information for 1979 to 1985.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the number of allegations of police maltreatment of prisoners in their custody in Northern Ireland other than under emergency powers during the years 1975 to 1985 on a year by year basis; how many investigations were held; and how many of the allegations were upheld during the same years, again on a year by year basis.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 19 January 1987]: The information is not available in the form requested and can only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Convictions (Evidence)

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the number of those convicted, on a year-by-year basis, since 1975 on uncorroborated contested confession evidence.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 19 January 1987]: Courts make their decisions having regard to all the admissible evidence which is placed before them. It is not possible to identify cases in which the eventual decision depended only on accomplice evidence.

Woodlands (Conservation)

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on arrangements to ensure the conservation of broadleaved woodlands and on felling licence regulations.

Mr. Viggers [pursuant to his reply, 20 January 1987]: Legislative powers are available to enable broadleaved woodlands of high scientific value to be conserved and there is ongoing survey of woodlands to identify those which require special conservation measures. The Department also has powers to make tree preservation orders where appropriate.

The Government have no plans to introduce felling licence legislation.

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what safeguards exist to protect broadleaved and ancient semi-natural woodlands from felling or conversion to coniferous woodland or agricultural land.

Mr. Viggers [pursuant to his reply, 20 January 1987]: Truly ancient semi-natural woodland does not occur in Northern Ireland; broadleaved woodland generally is very limited in extent.

Under the Nature Conservation and Amenity Lands (Northern Ireland) Order 1985, the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland may protect any woodland of high scientific interest either by declaring it to be an area of special scientific interest or by acquiring it as a National Nature Reserve. The Department may also enter into a covenant or management agreement with the owner of a woodland for the purpose of conserving or enhancing the natural beauty or amenity of the land.

The Department also has powers to make tree preservation orders where appropriate.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Anglo-Irish Agreement

Mr. Alton asked the Lord Privy Seal what progress has been made in the creation of a parliamentary tier to the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

Mr. Biffen: The creation of such a tier would be a matter for parliamentary decision in Westminster and Dublin. The issue remains under consideration.

ENVIRONMENT

Community Refurbishment Schemes

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many community refurbishment schemes have been completed or set up;

(2) if he will give details of a typical community refurbishment scheme, including the different amounts and sources of funds, and the sources of labour; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Community refurbishment schemes normally combine community programme, urban programme and local authority resources to enable unemployed local people to undertake two-year programmes to upgrade the environment on run down council estates. The resources used will vary according to the number of dwellings covered by the scheme, the amount of work carried out and the number of workers involved.

CRS were pioneered by the Department's Merseyside task force in the early 1980s. Eleven schemes have been completed on Merseyside and a further two schemes are in progress. In my Department, estate action (formerely known as the urban housing renewal unit) has extended the CRS initiative to the rest of England and in its first year has developed 10 schemes which are either under way or about to start — in Gateshead, Wigan, Hyndburn, Bradford, Calderdale, Kingston on Hull, Leeds, Coventry, Walsall and Blackburn. It is for local authorities to work up schemes in detail, but estate action is available to advise and has identified over 20 other estates as possible candidates for CRS.

Estate action encourages local authorities to combine CRS with the development of more localised management arrangements and other improvement works as part of a comprehensive approach to turning around unpopular and difficult to let estates. Where appropriate, estate action may make additional resources available to local authorities to help support these other measures.

Housing Development

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether local authorities are required to alter the zoning of open space prior to giving themselves planning permission for housing development.

Mr. Tracey: In considering any proposal for development a local planning authority should have regard to the provisions of the development plan and to any other material considerations. In London, where the development for which the authority seeks planning permission would conflict with or prejudice and implementation of the Greater London development plan, or a fundamental provision of the initial development plan for Greater London, or any local plan provision inserted by the Secretary of State, the authority must refer the proposal to the Secretary of State, who may, if he considers the circumstances warrant it, decide to call it in for his own determination. There is, however, no requirement that land shown as open space on a development plan should be reallocated before planning permission is given for housing development.

Home Improvement and Repairs

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is taking to promote home improvement and repairs in the north-west region; and how much is planned to be spent in 1986-87 and 1987-88 on this purpose.

Mr. Tracey: It is for local authorities to decide how much to spend on home improvement and repair from within the resources available to them. The total housing investment programme allocations to authorities in the north-west region, including Merseyside, were £205·47 million for 1986-87 and are £194·29 million for 1987-88. A number of authorities in the north-west have also received additional allocations from the resources set aside specifically for estate action schemes.

In addition, both Care and Repair Ltd. and the National Home Improvement Council's neighbourhood revitalisation services intend to establish agency services in the north-west, to provide practical help with repairs and improvements, as part of the initiative announced by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction last November. Care and Repair schemes are about to start in Liverpool and Wigan, and NRS discussing with the local authority the possibility of establishing a scheme in Hyndburn.

Betterment Levy

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made since 14 June 1984 in reducing the activities of the administrative unit in his Department collecting betterment levy, following the dissolution of the Land Commission in 1971.

Mr. Tracey: The majority of betterment levy cases still outstanding are subject to statutory postponement or legal charge and do not require frequent attention. The activities and time of staff involved have accordingly been reduced by more than two-thirds since 14 June 1984.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total number of transactions subject to betterment levy under the Land Commission Act 1967 under consideration by his Department at the latest convenient date; and in how many such cases (a) the assessment is determined but still unpaid, (b) the assessment is in dispute but still under negotiation, (c) the assessment is the subject of proceedings before the lands tribunal or the courts and (d) a legal decision has been made but the tax not yet paid.

Mr. Tracey: As at 30 September 1986 the number of betterment levy cases outstanding was 144. Of these:

(a) 139 were determined assessments still unpaid;
(b) five were in dispute but still under negotiation;
(c) there were no cases subject to proceedings before the Lands Tribunal or the courts;
(d) five of the determined assessments had been subject to decisions by the Lands Tribunal, and legal charges were held in a further 38 cases. No legal action had been taken against any of the remainder.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the amount of betterment levy and interest thereon collected by his Department in the financial years 1984-85 and 1985-86; how many full-time staff were involved in assessment and collection; and what was the overall administrative cost.

Mr. Tracey: The amounts of betterment levy and interest thereon collected during the financial years 1984-85 and 1985-86 were as follows:

	Levy £	Interest £	Total £
1984-85	14,607·26	38,878·64	53,485·90
1985-86	56,609·68	26,539·57	83,149·25

Two full-time staff were employed on this work until September 1984; only one member of staff has been substantially involved since that date. The overall administrative costs of collection, including additions for senior and legal staff, are estimated at £25,000 for 1984-85 and £10,000 for 1985-86.

Engineers, Architects and Surveyors (Overseas Earnings)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will estimate for 1984 and 1985 the figures for total overseas earnings of British consulting engineers, architects and surveyors remitted to the United Kingdom.

Mr. John Patten: The overseas earnings of British consulting engineers and chartered surveyors net of overseas expenses were £577 million and £92 million respectively in 1984 and £562 million and £99 million respectively in 1985. Figures for architects' overseas earnings are not available.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the public bodies for which he is responsible on which the consideration of the appointment or co-option of a person with knowledge of disability is a statutory requirement; if he will name the persons so appointed or co-opted on each body; and if he will indicate which of those persons is a person with a disability.

Mr. Ridley: None of the public bodies for which I am responsible has such a statutory requirement.

Gipsies

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will use his powers to require all of the authorities in West Yorkshire to make further provision for gipsies.

Mr. Tracey: Any proposals put to my right hon. Friend by my hon. Friend will be considered on their merits. My right hon. Friend's powers of direction do not, however, extend to the three authorities in West Yorkshire which have already provided more sites than they are required to do by statute.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each district, metropolitan borough and London borough (a) the rate support grant for 1987-88 plus the rate support grant for higher tier authorities, including the shire counties, Inner London education authorities and joint boards created in the wake of the abolition of the Greater London council and metropolitan counties, distributed to the relevant lower tier authorities in proportion to their relative populations, (b) the figure in column (a) divided by the population of the authority, (c) in 1986 prices the rate support grant paid in 1978-79 plus the rate support grant for any higher tier authority, including the shire counties and metropolitan counties since abolished, distributed in proportion to the then population of the lower tier authority, (d) the figure in column (c) divided by the then population of the authority and (e) the percentage change between column (b) and column (d).

Mr. Chope: I shall answer this question shortly.

Defective Housing

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the number of houses in each local authority areas for which the local authority has received funds for repairs and for buy-back under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Mr. Tracey: Under the housing defects legislation central Government contributes towards local authorities' costs in giving reinstatement grants and in buying back designated dwellings. Authorities claim Exchequer contribution a year in arrears, and the payments take the form of annuities payable over 20 years. To date, 138 local authorities in England have submitted claims totalling £2·3 million, but their returns do not give the numbers of dwellings involved.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what representations he has had from Leeds city council on the problem of Reema dwellings in the city; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what research he has carried out into methods of rectifying defects in Reema multistorey flats;

(3) if he will make a special capital allocation to Leeds city council to enable rehabilitation or replacement of Reema dwellings to take place; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he will issue a circular to local authorities unable to bring multi-storey flats up to his recommended safety standards; and if he will make a statement;

(5) if he will treat the problem of Reema construction in the same way as Airey construction, and make special resources available;

(6) if he will list in the Official Report the number of Reema dwellings in each local authority area, and the number still occupied in each case.

Mr. John Patten: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Riverpoint Hostel, Hammersmith

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) why Riverpoint hostel in Hammersmith has not received the grant awarded by the London borough grants scheme;

(2) when he expects the London borough grants scheme to release the grant awarded to Riverpoint hostel in Hammersmith.

Mr. Tracey: This is a matter for the London Boroughs Grants Committee, to which inquiries should be made.

Building Research Establishment

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he received the report on the Building Research Establishment; and if he will publish it.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend will be making an announcement shortly.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Arms Control Talks

2. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to receive a report from the United States Administration on the progress of the arms control talks in Geneva.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We are in close and regular contact with the United States Administration on the full range of arms control issues, including the nuclear and space talks at Geneva. I discussed these issues thoroughly with Mr. Shultz 10 days ago and shall be seeing Mr. Kampelman tomorrow.

73. Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress with arms control negotiations with the Soviet Union.

Mr. Renton: The sixth round of the US — Soviet nuclear and space talks began in Geneva on 15 January. We have maintained our close consultations with the US on the issues raised by these talks. After the Reykjavik meeting between President Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev, the Prime Minister and President Reagan agreed at Camp David on priorities for the way ahead:

(i) an INF agreement, with restraints on shorter range systems

(ii) a 50 per cent. cut over 5 years in US and Soviet strategic offensive weapons

(iii) a ban on chemical weapons.

In all cases effective verification would be essential.

In the area of strategic defence we support the SDI research programme which is permitted by the ABM treaty, and have consulted closely with the US on its handling on the Geneva negotiations. Soviet insistence on making agreement on all issues, including INF, dependent on their demands on SDI is illogical and unacceptable.

The 40th round of the mutual and balanced force reduction (MBFR) talks ended on 4 December 1986 with the East still refusing to give a serious response to the major Western initiative of December 1985. In this we proposed that reductions in forces go ahead before any exchange of information on forces, and that the dispute over existing force levels be resolved in the course of checking compliance. The next round opens on 29 January.

On chemical weapons, the intersessional work of the United Kingdom-chaired committee at the Conference on Disarmament has made further progress towards a total ban.

I visited the Soviet Union on 13-18 January and arms control was among the subjects discussed. My right hon. Friend, the Prime Minister, will visit the Soviet Union in the spring.

Human Rights

10. Mr. Woodall asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the United Kingdom delegation to the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe Helsinki review meeting in Vienna will raise individual human rights cases in discussions with the delegation from the Soviet Union.

Mr. Renton: Our CSCE delegation at Vienna have already raised a number of individual Soviet human rights cases. We will continue to press the Soviet authorities to honour all the obligations they have freely undertaken as signatories of the Helsinki Final Act.

22. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information is available to him on human rights in Kampuchea.

Mr. Renton: The information available to us is limited. But we are seriously concerned by reports that abuses of human rights are occurring in Cambodia under the Heng Samrin regime and the occupying Vietnamese forces.

23. Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on human rights violations in Afghanistan.

Mr. Eggar: Large-scale violations of human rights continue. These are documented in the recent report of the United Nations special rapporteur. A report by Amnesty International includes accounts of the complicity of Soviet personnel in the torture of prisoners. We are deeply concerned at these allegations, and have made that concern clear to the Soviet Government.

30. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which human rights organisations in Chile have been visited by United Kingdom diplomatic staff in the past year; and on what dates.

Mr. Eggar: Her Majesty's diplomatic staff have had frequent and continuous contact with the main Chilean human rights organisations, in particular the Chile Commission for Human Rights and the Catholic Church's Vicaria de la Solidaridad.

43. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the Soviet proposal for a conference on human rights to be held in Moscow within the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe.

Mr. Renton: The Soviet authorities have undertaken to provide further details of their progress at the Vienna CSCE review meeting.

Any meeting of this type on human rights or humanitarian issues would have to offer a real prospect of practical improvement in implementation of CSCE commitments.

50. Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether there has been any recent improvement in the Soviet record of human rights.

Mr. Renton: Despite the welcome release in recent months of a number of prominent campaigners for human rights, we have seen no fundamental change in Soviet attitudes. Many thousands remain in detention or continue to suffer persecution for their convictions. During my visit to the Soviet Union last week, I urged the Soviet authorities to improve their record on human rights.

54. Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has any evidence of a change in the Soviet practice of using psychiatric hospitals to incarcerate political dissidents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The Soviet authorities continue to incarcerate some individuals in psychiatric hospitals for speaking out about human rights abuses in the Soviet Union. We deplore this pernicious practice and shall continue to press the Soviet authorities to end it.

55. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government have made any recent representations to the South Korean Government concerning human rights.

Mr. Renton: I have nothing further to add to the reply which I gave to the hon. Member on 2 December 1986, Official Report, volume 106, column 542.

66. Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the leader of the United Kingdom delegation to the conference for security and co-operation in Vienna has had an opportunity to raise individual cases of abuse of human rights during the discussions which are currently taking place.

Mr. Renton: Yes. Both the leader of our delegation and his staff have criticised many different types of human rights abuse and referred to individual cases. Regrettably it is not possible for them to raise more than a small proportion of the many cases brought to their attention.

72. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further representations he has made about the abuse of human rights in Nepal.

Mr. Eggar: We maintain close contact with the Nepalese Government, who are aware of our concern about abuses of human rights.

74. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what were the latest representations made by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of Sri Lanka regarding human rights.

Mr. Eggar: We ensure that the Sri Lankan Government are very much aware of the concern felt in Britain at the allegations of human rights violations in Sri Lanka. The memorandum attached to my right hon. and learned Friend's speech to the UNGA September 1986 referred to the concern of the members of the European Community.

83. Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement about the negotiations at the conference on security and co-operation in Europe meeting in Vienna with special reference to human rights.

Mr. Renton: The first Session of the CSCE review meeting in Vienna which ended on 19 December was devoted to a thorough review of the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act. The United Kingdom delegation and its Community partners emphasised their concern at the performance of the Soviet Union and some other countries.

When the meeting resumes on 27 January it will complete the review of implementation and move on to discussion of new proposals. In considering such proposals the United Kingdom delegation will be searching for new ways of ensuring better implementation of CSCE commitments in the future.

90. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has made any representations recently to the Government of Honduras on the subject of human rights.

Mr. Eggar: The Government of Honduras are well aware of our concern about respect for human rights in all countries of Central America.

92. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent contact Her Majesty's Government's official representative has had with human rights organisations in El Salvador.

Mr. Eggar: As part of their normal duties Her Majesty's diplomatic staff accredited to El Salvador maintain regular contact with human rights and other organisations including political parties, trade unions and the Roman Catholic church.

Lebanon

12. Mr. Campbell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received from the British ambassador in Beirut of the Palestine Liberation Organisation's new initiative to recreate a state within a state in Lebanon.

Mr. Renton: Her Majesty's ambassador in Beirut reports regularly on developments in Lebanon. We deplore the recent fighting around the Palestinian camps and call on all parties to exercise restraint and allow relief workers safely to carry out their essential tasks.

South Africa

13. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community to encourage reforms in South Africa.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Twelve worked continuously to bring home to the South African Government the need for genuine national dialogue. The House will recall, for example my Presidency visits to Southern Africa in July and the adoption in September of further measures signalling our joint concern. Regrettably the South African Government have not yet accepted the case for the fundamental reform which is needed.

20. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he intends to take further steps to assist the front-line states in southern Africa to resist economic pressure from South Africa.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We give substantial bilateral aid to the front-line states (£84 million in 1985). We have also pledged £25 million to the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference (SADCC), which aims to reduce its member states' economic dependence on South Africa. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development will attend SADCC's consultative conference in Gaborone in February.

37. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the European Community Council will next discuss the effectiveness of the current European Community sanctions against South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: South Africa was discussed at the last meeting of the European Council, on 5 December 1986. Foreign Ministers of the Twelve will continue to discuss the subject in meetings in European Political Co-operation.

38. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received concerning the South African authorities, extensions of controls on the press announced before Christmas and the United Kingdom Government's response thereto.

Mrs. Chalker: There have been a number of expressions of concern about these sweeping new press restrictions. Her Majesty's ambassador in Pretoria made representations to the South African Government on 19 December on behalf of the Twelve in which he deplored the imposition of the restrictions as being contrary to the principles of democracy and freedom of information.

45. Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government will now withdraw the sanctions imposed on the Republic of South Africa; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The restrictive measures we have adopted are designed to bring home to the South African Government the urgent need for fundamental, peaceful change. Regrettably there is no sign at present that they are prepared to take the steps needed to bring about such change.

47. Mr. Rhodes James asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in encouraging reforms in South Africa.

62. Mr. Norris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community to encourage reforms in South Africa.

87. Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in encouraging reforms in South Africa.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Twelve worked continuously to bring home to the South African Government the need for genuine national dialogue. The House will recall, for example, my presidency visits to Southern Africa in July and the adoption in September of further measures signalling our joint concern. Regrettably the South African Government have not yet accepted the case for the fundamental reform which is needed.

52. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about Anglo-South African relations.

Mrs. Chalker: Our relations with South Africa remain overshadowed by the issue of apartheid. We continue to seek an early end to apartheid in South Africa and its peaceful replacement by a non-racial, representative system of government.

65. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the South African authorities following the latest imposition of further repressive measures; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Her Majesty's ambassador in Pretoria made representations to the South African Government on 19 December on behalf of the Twelve to express our joint concern at serious abuses of human rights in South Africa. He stated that the Twelve deplored the apparent continuation of forced removals from black townships, the continuing and indefinite detention without charge of large numbers of people and especially of many young people and children and the imposition of draconian new restrictions on press freedom.

Soviet Union

16. Mr. Gorst asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information is available to him on the trends in Jewish emigration permitted by the Soviet authorities.

Mr. Renton: Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union has fallen to an unacceptably low level since its high point in the late 1970s. I met Ambassador Kashlev, head of the Soviet delegation to the CSCE review conference, in Moscow last week and made it clear to him that we expect to see a reversal of this trend.

42. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his assessment of the consequences for Anglo-Soviet relations of Mr. Gorbachev's declared intention of more openness in Soviet society.

Mr. Renton: The Soviet system is highly intolerant of free information. Greater openness, of which there are some limited signs, would be a significant and encouraging development. It could help create the conditions for greater mutual understanding between our countries and peoples.

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will raise with the Soviet Foreign Minister the subject of that country's compliance with its obligations under basket 3 of the Helsinki agreements, with particular reference to the recently published Soviet regulations on emigration from the Union Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Renton: I raised this question during my meetings with Soviet Ministers and officials in Moscow last week. I urged that there should be an increase in the level of Jewish emigration, and that it should become easier for all those who wish to do so to leave the Soviet Union.

Angola

18. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations with Angola.

Mrs. Chalker: We have full diplomatic relations with Angola.

Barbican (Conference)

19. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library a copy of the report made by the official of his Department who attended the conference held at the Barbican on 7 and 8 December 1986 addressed by Senor Arturo Cruz.

Mr. Eggar: No. It has not been the practice of any Government to make such reports available.

Gibraltar

21. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on his meeting in December with the Chief Minister of Gibraltar, Sir Joshua Hassan.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend and my right hon. and noble Friend met Sir Joshua Hassan, the Chief Minister of Gibraltar, for approximately an hour on 8 December. They discussed a number of issues relating to the economic development of Gibraltar. They also reviewed the progress of our discussions with Spain under the Brussels agreement and prepared the ground for the meeting with the Spanish Foreign Minister on 13 and 14 January.

Cyprus

24. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the high commissioner for Cyprus; and what issues were discussed.

Mr. Eggar: The high commissioner has regular contact with FCO Ministers and officials.

My right hon. and learned Friend has met the high commissioner on a number of occasions over the past year, the last of which was in November. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend met President Kyprianou for a full discussion last April. We also have frequent contact with the Cypriot Government at official level.

Overseas National (Military Training)

25. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what foreign policy objectives are served by the training in the United Kingdom of military personnel from El Salvador; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: President Duarte's democratically elected Government is publicly committed to strengthening democracy and eradicating human rights abuses. We support these objectives and the offer to train one or two Salvadorean cadets is consistent with them.

53. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department makes of the effect of training in the United Kingdom for officers of the armed forces of other nations on the observance of human rights in those countries.

Mr. Renton: We monitor the human rights situation carefully in all those countries from which officers of the armed forces train in the United Kingdom. However, it is not possible to establish any direct causal relationship between training in the United Kingdom and the observance of human rights in the countries concerned.

Belize

26. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he plans to seek to pay an official visit to Belize.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans at present to visit Belize.

Atlantic Alliance

27. Mr. Knowles asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the future of the Atlantic Alliance.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Membership of the NATO Alliance is the cornerstone of British security policy. I am confident it will remain so for the foreseeable future. NATO enters 1987 united and in good heart.

EC (United Kingdom Presidency)

28. Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in promoting the Community's position in international affairs.

67. Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in promoting the Community's position in international affairs.

80. Mr. Crouch asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in promoting the Community's position in international affairs.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Twelve spoke and acted together on a wide range of international issues during the British presidency. Significant achievements during the period included:

—Common action against Syria's involvement in terrorism which I announced on 10 November.

—Active cooperation on East/West issues, in particular, in achieving the successful outcome of the Stockholm conference.

— A common position on South Africa based on promoting peaceful change through national dialogue.

A fuller list of presidency achievements has been placed in the Library of the House.

39. Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the main achievements of the United Kingdom's presidency of the European Economic Community.

56. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on achievements secured during Britain's presidency of the European Community.

68. Mr. Mates asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on achievements secured during Britain's presidency of the European Community.

69. Mrs. Kellett-Bowman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on achievements secured during Britain's presidency of the European Community.

79. Mr. Normanton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on achievements secured during Britain's presidency of the European Community.

91. Sir Anthony Kershaw asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on achievements secured during Britain's presidency of the European Community.

Mrs. Chalker: A full account of achievements under the United Kingdom presidency has been placed in the Library of the House.

Among the most important, I would emphasise:

— The crucial importance of agreement on Common Agricultural Policy reform;

—The adoption of more internal market measures than in any previous half year; and —The adoption of an action programme for employment growth and agreement on measures to help small businesses.

40. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in tackling international terrorism.

44. Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in tackling international terrorism.

51. Sir Philip Goodhart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in tackling international terrorism.

59. Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in tackling international terrorism.

Mr. Eggar: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 12 January, Official Report, Vol. 108, col. 7.

82. Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what have been the achievements of his presidency of the European Council of Ministers in relation to gaining a settlement of the conflict between the Israeli and Palestinian peoples.

Mr. Renton: We have remained in close touch with the parties to the conflict and have played an active part in the search for a settlement. The European Community aid and trade measures for the occupied territories announced on 27 October, which we fully support, should encourage economic development and improve the atmosphere for negotiations.

Single European Act

29. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many member states of the European Economic Community have now passed the necessary legislation to implement the Single European Act into their domestic law; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: All member states have passed the necessary legislation to implement the Single European Act into their domestic law. The Single European Act will enter into force on the first day of the month following that in which the last member state ratifies. All member states except Ireland have deposited their instruments of ratification.

Afghanistan

31. Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has any evidence of east European participation in the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Eastern European economic and military assistance in Afghanistan is minimal compared with that of the Soviet Union. We estimate that up to the end of 1986 the total value of east European economic assistance was about $150 million, compared with estimated Soviet assistance of $2·5 billion. Military assistance seems to have taken the form of trucks, medical items, and items such as small arms and ammunition, as well as some military advisers and technicians. In addition, Afghan personnel have been trained in eastern Europe. We have no evidence of east European troops engaging in combat.

76. Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent withdrawal of troops by the Soviet Government from Afghanistan.

Mr. Eggar: As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) on 3 December 1986, the claimed withdrawal was stage-managed and had minimal military significance. We call on the Soviet Union to withdraw all their troops at the earliest opportunity. This is the key to peace.

78. Mr. McLoughlin asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress towards the removal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan.

Mr. Eggar: There has been some progress in the talks held under United Nations auspices, but the Soviet Union and the Kabul regime have prevaricated on the central question of a timetable for the rapid and complete withdrawal of the Soviet occupying troops. We look to the Soviet Union to show the necessary political will to make a genuine, lasting and peaceful settlement possible, in accordance with successive United Nations resolutions.

93. Mr. Allan Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on progress towards an independent, democratic Afghanistan.

Mr. Eggar: As I have said in my earlier reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin) there has been some progress in the United Nations talks. But the key to lasting peace of Afghanistan remains the prompt and complete withdrawal of Soviet troops and genuine self-determination for the Afghan people. This has yet to be achieved.

95. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about relations with Afghanistan.

Mr. Eggar: As I previously told the hon. Member on 18 December 1985, we have no substantive relations with Afghanistan.

Following the Soviet invasion in December 1979, we withdrew the ambassador at Kabul and suspended our aid programme to Afghanistan. We continue to seek the restoration of freedom and independence for the Afghan people.

Strategic Defence Initiative

32. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he had with the United States Secretary of State regarding the development of the strategic defence initiative and its relevance to international treaty obligations.

Mr. Renton: As I told the hon. Member on 3 December 1986, we regularly hold discussions with the United States Administration on a wide range of political military issues. The ABM treaty, to which the United Kingdom is not a party, is raised in the course of these discussions as appropriate. My right hon. and learned Friend last met Mr. Shultz on 6-7 January in Bermuda.

Moscow (Prime Minister's Visit)

33. Mr. John Browne asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make an announcement concerning the date of the Prime Minister's visit to Moscow.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is to visit Moscow in the spring at the invitation of the Soviet leadership. The dates will be announced in due course.

Caribbean

34. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the future of the dependent territories in the Caribbean.

Mr. Eggar: We are committed to ensuring the good administration of Caribbean dependent territories in accordance with our United Nations obligations and to assisting the transition to independence of those territories which want it.

60. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next intends to seek to visit any of the countries of the Caribbean basin.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend visited Barbados from 1-2 January. He has no plans at present to make further visits to any countries of the Caribbean basin. My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs is currently visiting Jamaica, Puerto Rico, Trinidad and Tobago, Antigua and Barbuda, Dominica and Barbados.

88. Mr. Bob Edwards asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on current relations with Grenada.

Mr. Eggar: We enjoy close and friendly relations with Grenada.

Iran-Iraq War

35. Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what new initiatives he is instigating to try to bring about a ceasefire in the Iran-Iraq war in the light of the latest casualty figures.

Mr. Renton: This wasteful conflict is of concern to us and to our friends and allies. Many have tried to persuade the combatants to negotiate an end to it. Since bilateral exhortation has had little practical effect, we shall continue to take all suitable opportunities in concert with others and in international fora, notably the United Nations, to promote a ceasefire.

63. Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has recently held talks with other European Community Foreign Ministers on the Iran-Iraq war in the light of recent events.

Mr. Renton: The Iran-Iraq conflict figured prominently on the Agenda for discussions at all levels within European Political Co-operation during the British presidency. In particular, it was raised at the meetings of EC Foreign Ministers in London on 10 November and 5 December.

US National Security Council

36. Mr. Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations between the staff of the United States National Security Council and the British embassy in Washington.

Mr. Eggar: Her Majesty's Embassy in Washington has a good and close relationship with the National Security Council staff as with other US Government agencies.

Mr. Mordecai Vanunu

41. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has received any further information from Israeli sources concerning the method of departure of Mr. Mordecai Vanunu from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Renton: No.

Nuclear Weapons

46. Mr. Cockeram asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the United States Government on the future of nuclear weapons in Europe.

Mr. Renton: Nuclear arms control was discussed during the meeting between my right hon. and learned Friend and Mr. Shultz in Bermuda on 6-7 January as part of their regular and continuing consultations on these matters.

India

48. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current state of relations between the United Kingdom and India in the light of the recent visit by the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton).

Mr. Eggar: We have close and wide-ranging relations with the Indian Government.

The Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) visited India on 10-11 December 1986. He had cordial discussions that included detailed discussion of measures to deal with terrorist activities directed against India. My hon. Friend strongly reiterated Britain's firm commitment to the unity and territorial integrity of India. Both sides made clear their view that the encouragement of violence and the stirring of religious and racial prejudice had no place in their democratic societies. The two Governments agreed to hold further discussions on a proposed extradition treaty, and to remain in close touch in dealing with terrorist activities directed against India.

Falklands Fisheries

49. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether licences granted for fishing in the Falklands fishing zone will specify catchable quantities, equipment to be used or any other restriction; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: No. But the number of licences available for the 1987 fishing season in the Falkland Islands interim conservation and management zone reflects the conservation requirements of the fishery and takes account of the size, type and equipment of the fishing vessel.

58. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which countries have now applied for licences to fish in the Falkland Islands protection zone.

Mr. Eggar: Applications for licences to fish in the Falkland Islands interim conservation and management zone were received by the Falkland Islands Government from companies from the United Kingdom, the Falkland Islands, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Chile, Japan, the Republic of Korea, Poland and Taiwan.

Contra Terrorists

57. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contact he has had with the United States Administration on the funding of the Contra terrorists.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend regularly discusses important issues, including the situation in Central America, with the United States Administration.

Arms Control Talks

61. Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the progress of the mutual and balanced force reduction talks in Vienna.

Mr. Renton: Progress at the MBFR talks has been disappointing as the Warsaw Pact continues to refuse to give a realistic response to the Western proposal of December 1985, in which we made a constructive attempt to break the long-standing deadlock by offering to accept troop reductions without prior agreement on force levels.

Iraq

64. Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make any trade and financial arrangements with the Government of Iraq conditional on a substantial improvement in that country's human rights record; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We have consistently made clear our concern about the human rights situation in Iraq, and will continue to do so on every suitable occasion. We do not believe that linking trade or financial arrangements to the question of human rights abuse will lead to significant improvements in the situation.

BAOR

70. Sir Michael Shaw asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has discussed with the Foreign Minister of the Federal German Republic any proposals to withdraw short-range nuclear weapons from the British Army on the Rhine; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We have had no such discussions. It is NATO's policy to maintain the minimum number of nuclear weapons necessary for effective deterrance. We are now implementing the Montebello decision of October 1983 to reduce NATO's non-strategic nuclear warheads by 1,400 by 1988.

Namibia

71. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received regarding the situation in Namibia.

Mrs. Chalker: In the last six months we have received representations from various sources regarding the situation in Namibia. These include parliamentary questions and letters from hon. and right hon. Members, non-governmental organisations and members of the public.

Nicaragua

75. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent action he has taken at the United Nations Security Council on Nicaragua.

Mr. Eggar: We have not initiated any recent action in the United Nations Security Council on Nicaragua.

96. Mr. Heffer asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what meetings his officials have had with representatives of the Nicaraguan Contras; and for what purpose.

Mr. Eggar: As part of their normal duties, members of Her Majesty's diplomatic service have contact with political organisations linked to the Contras.

97. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many representations he has received regarding the attacks by the Contras on the elected Government of Nicaragua; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: No detailed analysis is made of the precise nature of representations made by correspondents. In 1986 we received 188 letters from hon. and right hon. Members and 358 letters from individuals and organisations on the subject of Nicaragua, including attacks by the Contras. In reply, we made it clear that we do not believe the problems of Central America can be resolved by armed force.

Central America

77. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to seek to pay an official visit to central America in the near future.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs will be visiting Guatemala on 9-10 February to attend the Meeting of Foreign Ministers of EC-Central America and Contadora Group.

Middle East (Christmas Celebrations)

81. Mr. Bidwell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response has been received to Her Majesty's Government's representations to the Saudi Arabian authorities and the United Arab Emirates to allow Christmas celebrations for Christians living in those countries.

Mr. Renton: We have made no representations to the Governments of either Saudi Arabia or the United Arab Emirates asking them to allow Christmas celebrations for Christians living in their countries.

However, we are concerned that British citizens in all countries should be able to worship privately in accordance with their conscience. Where problems may occur, the embassy monitors the situation closely and endeavours to ensure that suitable arrangements are made.

Naval Exercise (Gulf)

84. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the value of the recent joint naval exercise in Oman in helping to ensure the safety of British seamen operating in the Gulf.

Mr. Renton: The combined manoeuvres held in November and December last year were part of Saif Sareea, a large scale Anglo-Omani exercise. It was not directly concerned with the protection of Gulf shipping and took place over a hundred miles from the Gulf. However the Royal Navy has increased its profile in the Gulf to provide reassurance and, if necessary, assistance to British merchant shipping.

Iran-Iraq (Arms Supply)

85. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received proposing changes in the guidelines which govern the supply of arms to Iran and Iraq and the training in the United Kingdom of their military personnel.

Mr. Renton: I have received a number of letters from hon. and right hon. Members and members of the public, on this subject. We have no plans to change the guidelines which have proved effective in implementing our policy of strict impartiality in the Iran-Iraq conflict and of not supporting the war-making capabilities of either side.

Austrian State Treaty

86. Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received regarding the exercise by Her Majesty's Government of their obligations as a party to the Austrian state treaty of 15 May 1955.

Mr. Eggar: The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) wrote to my right hon. and learned Friend about the Austrian state treaty on 30 July 1986. The right hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Freeson) wrote to my right hon. and learned Friend about the same matter on 15 August 1986, and tabled a written question which I answered on 24 October 1986, Official Report, Vol. 102, c. 1007.

Western European Union

89. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of the proposal for the reactivation of the Western European Union.

Mr. Eggar: The revival of the Western European Union launched in 1984 is proceeding well. The Paris agencies for the study of defence and security questions have been active since their creation on 1 January 1986. The London secretariat has been slightly expanded to service the increased work load of the council. Further institutional refinements will be implemented in the early part of this year. WEU Foreign and Defence Ministers continue to meet at six-monthly intervals, most recently in Luxembourg in November 1986. Their discussions have shown that WEU has a valuable role to play as a forum for exchanging views on security questions of vital concern to Europe. We have played a prominent part in all aspects of the revival process.

Reykjavik Summit

94. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has any immediate plans to meet his United States counterparts to discuss foreign policy issues arising from the superpower summit at Reykjavik and consequent negotiations in Geneva.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend has no immediate plans to do so. But the talks he had with Mr. Shultz in Bermuda on 6-7 January covered a wide range of arms control issues. We shall continue to consult closely with the United States administration on these matters.

Council of Foreign Ministers

98. Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the European Economic Community Council of Foreign Ministers will next discuss the 1987 Budget.

Mrs. Chalker: The Budget Council reached a position on the 1987 Budget on 10-11 December. It is for the Belgian presidency to arrange further discussion in the Council should this be required.

Irish Foreign Secretary

99. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to meet the Irish Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend sees the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Ireland regularly at European Community meetings. The next such meeting will be in Brussels on 26-27 January. There will be a further meeting in Brussels on 16-17 February.

Iran

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all the occasions since January 1985 when Her Majesty's Government or military officials have visited Iran, stating in each case the purpose of the visit.

Mr. Renton: In April 1986 an official from ECGD went to Iran to investigate the possibility of further letters of credit being extended to Peugeot-Talbot.

In July 1986 two officials went from ECGD claims division to try to settle some outstanding claims.

In September 1986 an official from the FCO paid a familiarisation visit to Iran.

There were no visits to Iran by MOD officials within this period.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all the official delegations of Government-sponsored individuals or parties from Iran who have visited the United Kingdom since January 1985, stating in each case the purpose of the visit.

Mr. Renton: According to our records, in June 1985 the chairman of the Iranian Centre of Industrial Research and Development, accompanied by two board members, visited the United Kingdom to examine how industrial museums may be used for teaching purposes.

In October 1986 the Iranian Deputy Minister of Energy came to see work being undertaken on renewable energy sources, and to examine the possibilities of Anglo-Iranian co-operation in the setting up of such facilities in Iran.

USSR (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent visit to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics of the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) and, in particular, on his discussions about chemical weapons with the Soviet authorities.

Mr. Renton: I visited Moscow and Leningrad from 13 to 18 January. I had two and a half hours discussion with the Soviet Foreign Minister, as well as meetings with Mr. Bodrynin, head of the Central Committee's international department, First Deputy Foreign Minister Kovalev and other Soviet officials, and a prominent refusnik, Professor Lerner. Arms control was the main subject, but human rights, bilateral and regional questions were also discussed. On chemical weapons, the Soviet authorities confirmed that they wish to continue discussions in Geneva on the basis of the British proposals for challenge inspection.

Visas

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current waiting period for visit visas from applicants in the Indian sub-continent.

Mr. Eggar: The vast majority of applications for short-term stays in the United Kingdom are dealt with on the same day. For the small number of applications which require a detailed interview, the waiting time is nowhere longer than five days.

British Phosphate Commissioners

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the arrangements for winding up the office of the British Phosphate Commissioners.

Mr. Eggar: I would draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the Minute laid before the House on 19 January. When the affairs of the British Phosphate Commissioners (first established in 1919) are wound up by agreement between the Governments of the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand, the British Government have it in mind to spend the notional interest on their share of the Commissioners' assets to undertake a range of projects of benefit to the small states of the Pacific and elsewhere in the Commonwealth.

International Shipping Protection

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the United Kingdom will contribute to the proposed maritime force to protect international shipping in the Gulf; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: No formal proposal for an international maritime force has been made. We would envisage considerable difficulties in the organisation and operation of such a force, but any formal proposal would of course, be given serious consideration.

NATIONAL FINANCE

EC Budget Council

Mr. Key asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the latest meeting of the European Community Budget Council.

Mr. Brooke: The Budget Council met in Brussels on 16 January. I represented the United Kingdom.

The Council considered compromise proposals put forward in a rectifying letter by the Commission for resolving the differences between the Council and the European Parliament over the 1987 Community budget. The Commission had proposed, among other things, that the maximum rate of increase in non-obligatory expenditure should be exceeded by 62 mecu (£39 million*) for commitment appropriations but should be respected for payment appropriations. The Commission proposed that this should be achieved without cutting back the European Parliament's second reading proposals on substantive budget lines, by making provision for negative reserves of 124 mecu (£78 million) for commitment appropriations and 89 mecu (£56 million) for payment appropriations.

The United Kingdom opposed these proposals and the Council did not agree to them, or to certain variant proposals which were also discussed. The Council's position therefore remains as set out in the Council's second reading budget of 27 November, about which I reported to the House on 2 December 1986, at columns 598-99.

* All conversions in this answer are made at the 1987 Community Budget exchange rate of 1·5939 ecu to the £.

Nationalised Industries (Insurance)

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is Her Majesty's Government policy towards meeting the costs of insurance of nationalised industries.

Mr. MacGregor: All costs arising in the course of the industries' operations are taken into account in the annual investment and financing review, which determines their external financing provision. The results of the review are published in the public expenditure White Paper.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on insurance provision for nationalised industries.

Mr. MacGregor: The appropriate insurance provision for the nationalised industries is a matter for the commercial judgment of the industries' boards. Details of the policies on provision for insurance which they have adopted are normally set out in the industries' annual reports and accounts.

Data Processing Staff

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many data processing staff are in post within the Department of Customs and Excise; and how many of those are trainees.

Mr. Brooke: At 31 December 1986 Customs and Excise had 414 data processing staff in post; of this number 82 were trainees.

Cider Tax

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the revenue from cider tax for each of the financial years 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86; and what is his expectation of the yield for the year 1986-87.

Mr. Brooke: I refer my hon. Friend to table 35 on page 56 of the "Report of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise" for the year ended 31 March 1986, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Invisible Earnings

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the actual and the proportionate contributions to the United Kingdom's invisible earnings of the consulting engineering profession during the course of the last financial year.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 15 January 1987, c. 297]: I have been asked to reply.

The overseas earnings of British consulting engineers in 1985 were £562 million net of overseas expenses. This represented 45 per cent. of all net credits earned by United Kingdom consultancy firms and nearly 5 per cent. of all net services credits.

Shipping (Capital Allowances)

Sir William Clark asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has as to the annual pattern of capital allowances arising over a 10-year period for each £100 million of investment in British owned merchant ships under the tax regime for investment in shipping currently in force; and if he will give the same information in relation to the schemes for 50 per cent., 75 per cent. and 100 per cent. capital allowances, respectively, proposed by the shipping industry.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 19 January 1987]: The annual pattern of capital allowances available for take-up on expenditure of £100 million in 1987-88 under the current regime and under alternative regimes of 50 per cent., 75 per cent. and 100 per cent. first year allowances—with 25 per cent. reducing balance writing down allowances thereafter is as follows:

	Current Regime	50 per cent. First Year Allowance	75 per cent. First Year Allowance	100 per cent. First Year Allowance

AIDS

114. Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in combating the spread of AIDS.

115. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community to combat the spread of AIDS.

116. Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in combating the spread of AIDS.

Mr. Newton: I refer my hon. Friends to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 20 January 1987.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice his Department gives to regional health authorities' ambulance officers via the secretary of the Uni-disciplinary Group regarding AIDS.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will issue guidelines to ambulance personnel in connection with the attendance upon patients who have developed AIDS; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: In answer to inquiries from chief ambulance officers, in February 1985 officials of the Department drew regional health authorities' ambulance officers' attention to the interim guidelines which the Department had issued to health authorities in January 1985 (circular HC(85)2). No further requests for advice were received from members of the Uni-disciplinary Group before publication in June 1986 of revised guidelines (circular HN(86)20) setting out the measures to be taken by health authorities to safeguard the health and safety of people who, because of their work, come into direct contact with AIDS or other LAV/HTLVIII infected patients. Copies of both circulars are in the Library.

Mental Health Act 1982

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the progress of implementation of the Mental Health Act 1982.

Mrs. Currie: The new Act came into effect in 1983 as the Mental Health Act 1983. Its main provisions became operative on 30 September 1983, and the remaining provisions relating to the powers to remand patients to hospital became operative on 1 October 1984. In December last year my right hon. Friend issued a further circular to local authorities containing directions about the appointment of approved social workers under the Act.

The Mental Health Act Commission was established under the Act with effect from 1 September 1983. Commissioners make regular visits to all hospitals where patients are detained, and they are currently dealing with some 700 individual inquiries and complaints each year and arranging some 2,500 visits for second opinions on treatment. Their first biennial report was laid before Parliament in October 1985, and they have produced a draft code of practice on admissions and treatment and a discussion paper on consent to treatment. Officials are considering the extensive comments received in last year's cconsultation on the draft code of practice, and there will be further consultation before my right hon. Friend presents a definitive code to Parliament for approval prior to publication.

Although the changes the 1983 Act brought about are still recent, in general it is working satisfactorily. We shall keep its operation under review.

Hospitals (Kitchens)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report a list of capital developments providing new kitchens for hospitals built before 1956.

Mrs. Currie: From information collected centrally since 1979 on capital schemes, each costing over £1 million, table (I) shows the number of completed schemes and table (II) the programmed schemes at the planning, design or construction stages with kitchens included in their functional contents. All these schemes replace or develop existing facilities, the great majority of which would have been built before 1956. This information must underestimate the true position because there are many upgrading schemes costing less than £1 million on which information is not readily available.

Tobacco Advertising

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which magazines covered by the voluntary agreement on tobacco advertising come within the ban on such advertising by reason of the size of their readership among females aged between 15 and 24 years of age.

Mrs. Currie: The following magazines come with the scope of the ban:

Mizz

Statutory Sick Pay

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the total United Kingdom cost of statutory sick pay in each year since it was introduced.

Mr. Lyell: Statutory sick pay was introduced in April 1983. The latest information available is that payments totalling £440 million and £523 million were made in 1983-84 and 1984-85 respectively. Details for 1985-86 will be available in about three months.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all the public bodies for which he is responsible on which the consideration of the appointment or co-option of a person with knowledge of disability is a statutory requirement; if he will name the persons so appointed or co-opted on each body; and if he will indicate which of those persons is a person with a disability.

Mr. Major: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Blind and Partially Sighted People (Registration)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any proposals for action following a submission sent to his Department by the Royal National Institute for the Blind on 17 July 1986 recommending improvements in registration procedures for blind and partially-sighted people.

Mr. Major: I cannot yet add to my reply to the hon. Member on 12 December 1986, at columns 293-94.

Mental Patients

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of long-stay patients discharged from each mental hospital in England and Wales since 1981.

Mrs. Currie: The table shows the number of people discharged from each National Health Service mental illness hospital in England after a length of stay of five years or more, for each year from 1981 to 1985. Hospitals containing beds for mentally ill people only have been included. Figures for Wales are a matter for my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Wales. The figures include patients discharged from one hospital and admitted to another; for example some Rainhill patients have been transferred to other hospitals nearer their homes.

Discharges from hospitals with mental illness beds only of patients having a length of stay of five years or more England—1981-85

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to receive Sir Roy Griffiths' report on the Government's policy for community care of the mentally ill and mentally handicapped.

Mrs. Currie: As my right hon. Friend announced in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) on 16 December 1986, at columns 461-62, Sir Roy Griffiths has been asked to complete his overview of community care policy within 12 months.

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance he gives to health authorities on procedure to be followed on the siting of homes for mentally handicapped people within the community; what discussions have taken place between officials of his Department and East Dorset health authority on this subject insofar as it relates to the proposed home at Broadlands, Verndown; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mental Hospitals

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report lists showing (a) those long-stay mental hospitals currently approved for closure, (b) those long-stay mental hospitals listed in regional strategic plans as proposed for closure before 1995 and (c) those long-stay mental hospitals that have been indicated by regional health authorities as possibilities for closure outside the strategic planning period listing in each instance the present number of in-patients.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Abortions

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the number of abortions carried out in each local authority area for each of the past five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I regret that the information requested cannot be released for reasons of maintaining confidentiality.

Out-patients (Drugs)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice he has given London teaching hospitals in connection with prescribing drugs for patients attending out-patient clinics.

Mr. Newton: Long-standing guidance to all health authorities makes it clear that the duty of prescribing for out-patients rests with the doctor who at the time has clinical responsibility for the patient's treatment. When a hospital doctor is responsible he should prescribe; when the clinical responsibility is transferred to the general practitioner then the latter should prescribe.

Smoking (Breast Feeding)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what studies he has made of the effect of smoking on breast fed babies; and what advice he has given to general practitioners and others involved in community care of mothers who are breast feeding.

Mrs. Currie: Questions about mothers' smoking habits were included in the recent survey of infant and child feeding carried out by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys. A report is expected later this year. Health professionals are aware that mothers, including expectant and nursing mothers, should be strongly advised against smoking.

Hepatitis B

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the latest estimate of the number of people in the United Kingdom infected by the hepatitis B virus; and what proposals he has to make available to National Health Service patients the new Belgian genetically engineered vaccine.

Mrs. Currie: Laboratory reports indicate that currently about 1,300 cases a year of hepatitis B are diagnosed. Vaccination against the disease is already available under the National Health Service in certain circumstances. Any company proposing to introduce a new vaccine would first need a product licence. Information about applications for such licences is confidential.

Hospital Admissions

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report the hospitals in the West Midlands region where restrictions on non-urgent admissions were introduced in 1986, month by month; and how many beds were closed in each case.

Mr. Newton: I regret that the information requested by the hon. Member is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to write to the chairman of the West Midlands regional health authority for the information she seeks.

Waiting lists and times for in-patient treatment in the west midlands are falling. There were 79,293 patients waiting at 30 September 1986 compared with a peak of 89,858 in March 1979. The number of non-urgent patients waiting for more than a year fell to 22,174 in September 1986 from a peak of 33,559 in September 1979. My right hon. Friend recently announced a major three-year initiative on waiting lists and times and we anticipate further substantial reductions to be achieved as a result of the positive action planned by regional and district health authorities.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, for each region, all the hospitals that did not admit patients for elective surgery at some time during last year, and the number of days they did not make such admissions in each case.

Mrs. Currie: No comprehensive record of the occasions on which elective surgery has been suspended is kept centrally. There may be a variety of reasons, planned and unplanned, why elective surgery has to be suspended for a short period in a particular hospital. Day-to-day management of facilities within each hospital is a matter for the health authorities concerned.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many hospitals in each region are now refusing all but emergency admissions; and what percentage of hospitals this is in each region.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Neighbourhood Nursing

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in how many district health authorities plans have been made to implement the proposals for neighbourhood nursing teams set out in the report of the community nursing review team; how many have already set up such teams; and what information he has about plans by district health authorities to decentralise management of and service delivery by community units.

Mrs. Currie: The organisation of community nursing services is a matter for local decision in the light of local needs and circumstances, and information is not held centrally. Consultation on the report of the community nursing review team extended to the end of December 1986, and comments are still being analysed.

The organisation of management and service delivery within community unit is also for individual district health authorities to determine in consultation with the appropriate regional health authority. Again, no information is held centrally on patterns of decentralisation within community units.

Supplementary Benefit Tribunals (Chairmen)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what payment is currently given to chairmen of supplementary benefit tribunals; and what is now the average total cost of an appeal hearing.

Mr. Lyell: From 1 July 1986 a full-time chairman of a social security appeal tribunal receives a gross salary of £31,850 per annum and a part-time chairman receives £65 gross for a half-day session, plus expenses as appropriate.

It is estimated that the administration costs of the social security appeal tribunal system is of the order of £100 per tribunal hearing.

Neasden Hospital

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of the nurses and other National Health Service staff evicted from their homes at Neasden hospital in December are now in National Health Service accommodation elsewhere; and by whom the additional costs to these residents are being borne.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to bring the 30 residences now empty at Neasden hospital into use for the homeless before they deteriorate to the point where they need extra expenditure to restore them to viability.

Mrs. Currie: Neasden hospital is surplus to National Health Service requirements, and a planning application has been made to Brent council. Once that has been determined, the site will be sold as soon as practicable and the proceeds will accrue to the health service. It is for the health authorities concerned to consider possible short term alternative uses consistent with their responsibility for maintaining and securing the site.

NHS (Beds)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how the reduction in the average daily number of National Health Service beds between 1979 and now is distributed (a) by region and (b) by each district health authority.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now take steps to prevent any further cut back in National Health Service acute beds.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mortality Statistics

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of actual deaths in each week from 1 January to 31 March each year since 1979; what was the expected number of deaths for each of those weeks based on historical experience; and what was the percentage difference between the two.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on the basis of what precise section of primary or secondary legislation he decided that all persons in the relevant categories would receive a £5 exceptionally severe weather payment in the week 12 to 18 January.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Pensions

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what, for a man retiring on average earnings each year since 1978 and who had been contracted into state earnings related pension scheme, was the earnings-related component on top of the flat-rate state pension payable in each of those years.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 12 January 1987, at columns 123-24.

Social Workers

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what was the number of whole-time equivalent (a) home helps and (b) social workers in each local authority, and per 1,000 population over 65 years, each year since 1982;

(2) what has been the number of health visitors per 1,000 elderly people in each district health authority in each year since 1979;

(3) what has been the number of community nurses per 1,000 elderly people in each district health authority in each year since 1979.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have the information that is available as soon as possible.

Artificial Limbs

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many limbs were fitted at artificial limb and appliance centres in each month since January 1985;

(2) if he will publish in the Official Report the progress made towards implementing each of the recommendations of the McColl report;

(3) how many prosthetist appointments at artificial limb and appliance centres have been postponed due to failure to supply limbs in time because of the Hangers dispute;

(4) if he will list the organisations and individuals whose reaction to the McColl report has been obtained during the consultation period; and what are the main conclusions he draws from that consultation;

(5) when the McColl review of artificial limb and appliance centre services was completed; when he first received the report; and why the report was not published until 27 January 1986.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the reforms of the artificial limb service initiated by the National Health Service management board.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to the detailed account I gave during the debate in the House on 26 November, at columns 330-332, of the steps we have been taking to improve the artificial limb service.

Departmental Initiatives

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list initiatives by his Department which have been of benefit specifically to residents in Leicester.

Mr. Newton: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Health Authorities (Auditors)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which regional and district health authorities have employed their appointed auditors or firms with which they are associated to undertake work in addition to that relating to their duties as auditors.

Mr. Newton: The external audit of health authorities' accounts is normally undertaken by the Department's National Health Service audit branch. As an experiment, the Department has contracted with nine accountancy firms to undertake the audit of 14 district health authorities. We have advised these firms that they should not accept other work from the authorities to which they have been appointed.

Health authorities may also engage outside firms to provide their internal audit service. We do not collect information centrally about such arrangements.

Central Middlesex Hospital

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take immediate steps to re-open ward C2 at the Central Middlesex hospital.

Mrs. Currie: Provision of services at the Central Middlesex hospital is a matter for the Brent district health authority. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of Brent DHA about the position of ward C2.

King's Fund (Report)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now convene an emergency meeting of the National Health Service management board to consider the report of the King's Fund on inner London health services.

Mr. Newton: The King's Fund report is concerned primarily with the planning of health services in inner

London, and will be taken into account both by the management board and by the four Thames regions as those plans are reviewed and developed.

As the hon. Member is aware, in 1987-88 London will benefit from a special bridging fund of £30 million over two years which has been established, as well as from a share of the growth money recently allocated to the Thames regions. We are pursuing with regions the need to consider the needs of teaching and research and social deprivation when deciding allocations to districts, and these factors are being studied further by the RAWP review team.

Nurses

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take immediate action through the National Health Service management board to recruit nurses for Charing Cross hospital in order to enable the re-opening of its coronary care unit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Recruitment is the responsibility of the local health authority. I understand that Riverside health authority is making every effort to recruit suitably qualified nurses.

Hospitals (Patient Statistics)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many hospital in-patients were treated in National Health Service hospitals in each year since 1978;

(2) how many hospital out-patients were treated in National Health Service hospitals in each year since 1978;

(3) how many hospital day cases were treated in National Health Service hospitals in each year since 1978.

Mrs. Currie: The information requested is given in the table. Further details are contained in Statistical Bulletin 2/86 "NHS Hospital Activity Statistics for England 1974-1985", a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

[2] All figures are independently rounded to the nearest 100.

[3] During 1980, the standard working week for Nursing and Midwifery staff was reduced from 40 to 37½ hours. No adjustment has been made for the effects of this change.

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many doctors and dentists were employed in National Health Service hospitals in each year since 1978, expressed in terms of whole-time equivalents.

Mr. Newton: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given him by my predecessor on 3 July 1986 at column 632.

Provisional figures for 30 September 1986, in whole-time equivalents, are:—

Doctors	34,252
Dentists	1,064

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many general practitioners worked in the National Health Service in each year since 1978;

(2) what was the average number of people registered with each doctor under the National Health Service in each year since 1978.

Mr. Newton: The following is the information for unrestricted principal general medical practitioners in England:

NHS (Expenditure)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what has been the level of capital expenditure in the National Health Service, at constant prices, in each year since 1978;

(2) how much has been spent on the National Health Service in each year since 1978, at constant prices;

(3) by what proportion expenditure on the National Health Service has increased in real terms since 1978.

Mr. Newton: The table gives National Health Service capital expenditure and National Health Service total expenditure in England at 1985-86 prices since 1978-79. National Health Services total expenditure grew by 26 per cent. in real terms between 1978-79 and 1986-87.

Elderly and Disabled People (Housing)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has about practice of local authorities with regard to the housing of elderly and disabled people in groups of four per unit, with two people to a room.

Mr. Tracey: I have been asked to reply.

We have asked local authorities to concentrate their housing resources on those with special needs, including elderly and disabled people. They provide a wide range of accommodation for such people, from ordinary houses and flats to specialised dwellings, grouped schemes and residential homes. It is for each authority to decide what facilities to offer, based on its judgment of local needs and available resources. Neither my Department nor the Department of Health and Social Security requires local authorities to provide information to this level of detail in respect of its housing or residential care provision.

Hospital Expenditure

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will give for 1985-86 for each health authority the total expenditure on hospital catering, the total expenditure on services provided to hospitals by private catering companies, the latter figure as a percentage of the former and the difference between that percentage and the percentage in 1984-85;

(2) if he will give for 1985-86 for each health authority the total expenditure on hospital cleaning, the total expenditure on services provided to hospitals by private cleaning companies, the latter figure as a percentage of the former and the difference between that percentage and the percentage in 1984-85;

(3) if he will give for 1985-86 for each health authority the total expenditure on hospital laundry, the total expenditure on services provided to hospitals by private laundry companies, the latter figure as a percentage of the former and the difference between that percentage and the percentage in 1984-85.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 24 November 1986, c. 128-129]: The following table, which is derived from the annual accounts of regional and district health authorities, and the special health authorities for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals, shows their total current expenditure on catering, domestic and cleaning, and laundry services and the expenditure on private contracts included in these totals. The bulk of the total expenditure relates to hospital services but they are not identified separately within the figures for private contract expenditure.

[1] The 1985-86 figures do not include expenditure by family practitioner committees following their separation from health authorities on 1 April 1985. The form of family practitioner committees' accounts does not permit a similar analysis but their total 1985-86 expenditure on contracted out services in these categories was a little over £300,000.

Local Offices

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all the social security offices which have closed for either a whole day or days, or parts of a day or days, each month in the last year, in each case indicating the cause.

Mr. Lyell [pursuant to his reply, 15 January 1987, c. 304]: I regret that the information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mucodyne

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what decision he has taken in respect of Mucodyne syrup following the meeting of the Advisory Committee on National Health Service Drugs held on 28 October.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 18 December 1986, c. 706]: I have accepted the advice of the Advisory Committee on National Health Service Drugs, following its review of the drug Mucodyne (Carbocisteine), that this drug should not be generally available on National Health Service prescription.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Accidents

Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for Defence what liaison has taken place between his Department and the chief fire officer for south Yorkshire or South Yorkshire fire and civil defence authority concerning incidents involving radioactive materials.

Mr. Stanley: There is continuing liaison between my Department and the appropriate emergency services concerning contingency arrangements for dealing with incidents which may involve radioactive materials.

Meteorological Office

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all the Meteorological Office weather stations, indicating (a) minimum night temperatures, (b) daily mean temperatures and (c) weekly mean temperatures for the weeks 5 January to 11 January and 12 January to 18 January 1987, respectively.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I will answer shortly.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Common Agricultural Policy

113. Mr. Moynihan asked the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on achievements made during Britain's presidency of the European Community in reforming the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Jopling: I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 12 January at colun n 45.

Beam Trawlers

Mr. Steen asked the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he hopes to complete his full review of restrictive licensing arrangements, with special regard to provisions on beam trawlers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The full review of the restrictive licensing arrangements which is being carried out by the Fisheries Department in consultation with the United Kingdom fishing industry against the background of the new European Community structural measures in the fisheries sector, will take some months to complete. I am, however, aware of my hon. Friend's interest in certain aspects of the restrictions currently applying to beam trawlers in area VII and if, as the review proceeds, it is possible to make a separate announcement on these I shall not hesitate to do so.

Council of Agriculture Ministers

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Council of Agriculture Ministers meeting in Brussels on 19-21 January; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: With my right hon. Friend, I represented the United Kingdom at the Council of Agriculture Ministers on 19 to 21 January.

Much of the meeting was taken up with discussions of the negative monetary compensatory amounts to be applied to pigs, eggs and poultry following the recent EMS realignment conference. A political agreement was finally reached on a compromise under which the new increased negative mcas will be introduced for these sectors tomorrow, 22 January. There is provision for one and a half percentage points of pigmeat mcas to be removed in two stages — 0·5 of a point on 16 February and one point at the beginning of the 1987-88 milk year. For eggs and poultry the Council will take decisions before the beginning of the 1987-88 year on the basis of proposals which the Commission will be making generally on the agri-monetary system. I insisted throughout this difficult negotiation that there had to be parallel treatment for the United Kingdom in order to safeguard our interests and this was secured.

The Council reached an agreement on the quantity of manufacturing beef to be imported into the Community in 1987 under the balance sheet arrangements. The quantity agreed is 15,000 tonnes of processing beef (of which two thirds is to be for products of particular concern to the United Kingdom manufacturers); in addition a special quota of 8,000 tonnes of high quality beef was agreed. The Commission also repeated its assurance of last year about making beef out of intervention available for manufacturing. The Council also agreed on the import of 168,000 head under the balance sheet for male calves. Given the difficult situation in the beef sector in the Community, these arrangements are a satisfactory outcome for the current year.

The Council discussed and took a number of decisions in principle on arrangements for distributing free food through recognised charitable organisations to the poorest sections of the population who have suffered most from the severe winter. I welcomed this humanitarian action. Several details remain to be clarified by the Commission. Discussions have already taken place with representatives of charitable organisations in the United Kingdom on what administrative arrangement should be best made to ensure that the food is distributed efficiently and effectively to those who are to benefit. We shall announce details of these arrangements as soon as they have been worked out.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Irish Language

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he intends allocating extra finance towards the development of Irish language schools.

Dr. Mawhinney: The procedure for the recognition of any school as a grant-aided school is laid down in the Education and Libraries (Northern Ireland) Order 1986. Any new expenditure would have to be met from within the resources allocated to the Department of Education (Northern Ireland).

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if the use of the Irish language for street and place names is to be afforded a similar status to the bilingual policy operating in Wales;

(2) when he expects to announce the official recognition of street names in the Irish language.

Mr. Scott: Ministers are still considering possible ways in which the demand for dual language street names might be met. Any change in existing arrangements will require legislation, which will be subject to normal consultation before final decisions are taken.

Ministers are also considering what measures might be taken to make Irish language versions of place names in Northern Ireland more widely available.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures have been introduced specifically as a result of the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

Mr. Scott: The decisions and administration of government in Northern Ireland continue to be the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government alone, as article 2(b) of the Anglo-Irish Agreement makes clear. It is therefore not possible to attribute decisions specifically to the agreement. Nevertheless, the views and proposals we have received from the Irish through the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference have been an important and constructive contribution to a number of matters. The joint statements issued after each meeting of the conference, copies of which are in the Library, record the subjects which were discussed there.

Maghaberry Prison

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the cost of building and other alterations to Maghaberry prison during 1986; and what are the estimated costs for building and other alterations in 1987.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 16 January 1987, c. 339]: Eight hundred and sixteen thousand, four hundred and ninety seven pounds in 1986; the estimated cost for 1987 is £1,894,600.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in the Official Report for each local education authority in England for pupils of secondary age (a) the amount spent within that local education authority on assisted places, (b) the number of assisted places, (c) the average expenditure per assisted place pupil and (d) the percentage of the local education authority budget represented by expenditure on the assisted places scheme.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The latest available comparative information is as follows. The first three columns relate to the school year 1984-85. The final column takes as its base net institutional expenditure for the financial year 1984-85.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) whether his Department has carried out any investigation into the change in pupil achievement following the Government's increased support for the assisted places scheme;

(2) what assessment his Department has carried out into the effects of its policy of increased support of assisted pupils on the education system in England.

Mr. Dunn: Changes in individual pupils' achievement cannot be measured directly. However, the Government are satisfied that the broadening of educational opportunities provided by the scheme has been wholly beneficial.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many pupils from each local education authority area who have been awarded assisted places at independent schools have dropped out of the scheme in each year since the scheme's inception.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average expenditure per pupil on the assisted places scheme.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: £1,603 in the school year 1985-86.

Expenditure

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing the cost of teachers' salaries as a proportion of total expenditure on education in each year since 1978-79 and the amount spent by local education authorities on books and equipment over the same period at 1985-86 prices.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The table contains the information. The figures refer to maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools.

Year	Expenditure on Books and Equipment £ million real terms[1]	Teachers salaries[2] as per cent. of net institutional recurrent expenditure per cent.
1978-79	288	69·3

1983-84	254	69·7
1984-85	253	69·9

[1] The cash terms for each year have been repriced to 1985-86 prices using the gross domestic product (market prices) deflator.

[2] Teachers' salaries cost includes allowances, plus the employers' contributions towards national insurance and superannuation.

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing expenditure per pupil since 1974-75 in (a) primary schools, (b) special schools and (c) secondary schools in cash terms and at constant prices.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The available information is given in the following table:

Higher Education

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the estimated level of public spending on higher education in 1986-87 in cash terms and at 1985-86 prices.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Public expenditure on higher education which is the responsibility of my Department is estimated as £3,273 million in cash in 1986-87. That figure is equivalent to £3,178 million at 1985-86 prices, revalued by the GDP (market prices) deflator.

My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and Northern Ireland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland are responsible for further public expenditure on higher education.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he will reply to the questions from the hon. Member for Caerphilly concerning recruitment in public sector higher education to which holding answers were given on 15 December, Official Report, columns 389-90.

Mr. Dunn: I have replied to a number of these questions today and will reply to the remaining ones as soon as possible.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what is the number of students in public sector higher education in England and Wales for each of the last five years for which figures are available, divided into the 19 different programmes utilised by the National Advisory Body; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what the numbers of students in public sector higher education have been in the past five years for which figures are available, in each of the subject programmes, 01, 12, 13, 14, 16, and 17, as used by the National Advisory Body; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what the numbers and percentage is of public sector higher education students studying (a) in polytechnics and (b) in other colleges in each of the last five years for which figures are available in each of the subject programmes utilised by the National Advisory Body.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to the reply, 15 December 1986, c. 389-90]: The information requested is shown in the table. Provisional figures for 1986, when compared with 1985, indicate increases in programme 02 (technology), 04 (science), 08 (mathematics), 09 (business, management and accountancy) and 19 (INSET); and decreases in 01 (engineering), 11 (professional and vocational), 12 (social and admin. studies) and 14 (humanities). Figures for Wales are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the number of students in higher education studying fine art in each of the last five years for which figures are available, divided into the university and public sector of higher education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 15 December 1986, c. 389-90]: The available information is shown in the following table. Figures for university postgraduates are not collected in this detail. Numbers of part-time university undergraduates are so small they have not been provided in order to preserve confidentiality.

Higher education, fine art enrolments

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the percentages and full-time equivalent numbers of public sector higher education students in (a) full-time study, (b) sandwich study, (c) part-time evening and (d) part-time day, in the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 15 December 1986, c. 389-90]: The required figures are as follows:

Public sector higher education enrolments: England

[1] Provisional.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what the percentage change in the number of first year students on public sector higher education courses in the three areas of art, design and performing arts has been in the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 15 December 1986, c. 389-90]: The information requested is as follows. Provisional figures for 1986 indicate that the overall total for the three subject areas has increased from 12·4 to 13·4 thousand.

Public sector higher education: England
first-year students.

	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
Art (Thousands)	2·5	3·1	3·2	3·2	3·4

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what is the number and percentage of students aged 21 years and over who have been in public sector higher education in each of the last five years for which figures are available;

(2) what is the number and percentage of mature students aged 25 years and over who have been in public sector higher education in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 15 December 1986, c. 389-90]: Figures for each of the last five years for number and percentage of mature students in public sector higher education are shown in the table. Figures for 1986 are not yet available.

Public sector higher education: England

	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
Students[1] Aged 21 & over (Thousands)	221·1	225·3	236·7	241·8	261·9

All Students (Thousands)	368·4	384·2	402·6	410·0	427·9

[1] Part-time students have each been counted as one.

School Funds

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of Sate for Education and Science if he will investigate steps taken by Bradford council to prevent schools spending money raised by the efforts of their staff, parents and children; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has asked his officials to make inquiries of Bradford local education authority. I shall write to my hon. Friend when these inquiries are concluded.

Science Budget

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will give the figures for the proportion of his Department's science budget allocated to each of the constituent colleges of the University of Wales for each year since 1979; and what is the projected figure for 1987-88;

(2) if he will give the figures for the proportion of his Department's science budget allocated to institutions in Wales, other than the University of Wales, for each year since 1979; what is the projected figure for 1987-88; and if he will name these institutions;

(3) if he will give the figures for the amount allocated from his Department's science budget to (a) the constituent colleges of the University of Wales, and (b) other institutions in Wales for each year since 1979; and what is the projected figure for 1987-88.

Mr. Dunn: The research councils have been asked for this information. I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give the figures for the percentage rise in the science budget of his Department for each year since 1979; and what is the projected rise for 1987-88.

Mr. Dunn: The figures are as follows:

Year	Science budget cash £ million	Percentage rise each year	Science budget at constant prices £ million 1986-87	Percentage variation each year
1979-80	340	14·9	565	−1·7
1980-81	393	15·6	551	−2·4
1981-82	451	14·8	575	+4·4
1982-83	482	6·9	574	−0·2
1983-84	516	7·1	588	+2·4

1987-88	657	6·8	634	+3·1

University of Wales

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give the figures for the actual percentage rise in the funding for each of the constituent colleges of the University of Wales since 1979; and what is the projected percentage rise for 1987-88.

Mr. Dunn: The percentage rise in Government funding in cash terms through Exchequer grants and home students' fees between the academic years 1979-80 and 1984-85, the latest year for which the information is fully available, for the constituent colleges of the University of Wales is as follows:

	Per cent.
Aberystwyth University College	44
Bangor University College	54
Cardiff University College	70
St. Davids, Lampeter	71
Swansea University College	43
University of Wales College of Medicine	49
University of Wales Institute of Science and Technology	43
University of Wales Central Registry	32

The funding of the colleges in 1987-88 has not yet been determined.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give the figures for the recurrent grant to for each of the colleges of the University of Wales for each year since 1979in real terms; and what is the projected percentage rise for 1987-88.

Mr. Dunn: Recurrent grant paid to each of the colleges of the University of Wales for each year since 1979-80 in real terms (at 1985-86 prices using the GDP deflator) is shown in the following table.

The University Grants Committee has not yet allocated recurrent grant for 1987-88.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of his Department's university equipment grant was allocated to the University of Wales in each year since 1979; and what is the projected figure for 1987-88.

Mr. Dunn: The furniture and equipment grant allocation by the University Grants Committee to the University of Wales in each year since 1979-80, as a proportion of the total such grant allocated by the committee to universities, is as follows.

Academic year	per cent.
1979-80	5·4

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report a table based on table 3.12.1 of the public expenditure White Paper Cmnd. 56-II with all figures converted to 1986-87 prices.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information is set out in the table. The figures have been revalued using the GDP (market prices) deflator, which is assumed to rise by 3·75, 3·5 and 3·0 per cent. respectively in the years 1987-88 to 1989-90.

The figures for 1988-89 and 1989-90 in the table have been calculated by revaluing the unrounded planning figures for those years. All figures in the table have been rounded to the nearest £1 million.

ENERGY

Sizewell B (Report)

7. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to publish the Sizewell B inspector's report.

Mr. Peter Walker [pursuant to his reply, 24 November 1986, c. 7]: My right hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Moore) made it clear on 24 January 1983, at column 253, that my predecessor appreciated the strength of the case for a debate on the report of the Sizewell inquiry. In view of this I have asked the Leader of the House to arrange a debate so that I may hear the views of this House before I reach my decision. I shall publish the inspector's report on Monday 26 January, and place copies both of the full report and of a summary in the Library of the House and in the Vote Office.

I should like to express my gratitude to Sir Frank Layfield, his assessors and the inquiry secretariat for this comprehensive report.

Nuclear Industry

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish weekly from 1 January an input-output table of spent Magnox reactor fuel and depleted uranium/plutonium stocks arising from the throughput at the Windscale B205 reprocessing plant at British Nuclear Fuels, Sellafield.

Mr. Goodlad: No.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether there have been any delays in the dispatch of spent nuclear fuel from nuclear plants in the current year due to snow and ice on the rail network.

Mr. Goodlad: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether his Department has made any assessment of the maximum length of time spent nuclear fuel can be safely stored and monitored at nuclear reactor sites when severe weather conditions prevent the safe transport to Sellafield.

Mr. Goodlad: Irradiated fuel can be safely stored and monitored at nuclear reactor sites for prolonged periods of up to several years.

UKAEA (Trading Fund)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will place in the Library a copy of each of the programme letters drawn up in relation to the setting up of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority trading fund in 1986.

Mr. Goodlad: The programme letters themselves are commercially confidential. Summaries are being prepared and will be placed in the Library as soon as possible.

Electricity Supply (Isle of Thanet)

Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has as to the reasons for the failure of the supply of electricity to the Isle of Thanet from 14.15 on Friday 16 January to 02.00 on Saturday 17 January; and what steps are to be taken to ensure that a recurrence of this failure is rendered impossible in the future.

Mr. Goodlad: The Electricity Council has informed me that the failure of supply of electricity to the Isle of Thanet was due to the loss of both circuits of the 132 kV line from Richborough. The failure was caused by an exceptional combination of freezing fog and salt on the insulators which led to arcing and the breakage of one insulator string and damage to conductors. Electricity board linesmen worked into the night in most difficult and dangerous conditions to restore supplies.

The industry is carrying out an investigation and will consider what steps should be taken to reduce the risk of a recurrence.

Sweden

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he or his officials last visited Energy Ministers or officials in Sweden; and if he will make a statement on what was discussed.

Mr. Peter Walker: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State visited the Swedish Minister for Energy in 1985. A range of energy issues, including energy efficiency and the environment, were discussed.

One of my officials visited Sweden in December 1986 as part of an International Energy Agency team to discuss possible participation by Sweden in a collaborative information project.

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will initiate an inquiry into the effects of the recent severe weather on the emergency services near Calder Hall nuclear power station and, in particular, into (a) the effect of heavy snow falls and icy conditions on the mobility of vehicles required for evacuation purposes, (b) measures to ensure that under such weather conditions emergency personnel do not spend sufficient time within the disaster area to receive a fatal radiation dose and (c) the effect of such weather conditions on the mobility of fire engines; and what is his assessment as to whether the current emergency arrangements for a nuclear accident are adequate;

(2) what assessment his Department has made of the feasibility under the severe weather conditions recently experienced of extending the emergency plans for Sellafield and Calder Hall beyond the immediate area for which a detailed plan exists in the event of a worst case reactor accident.

Mr. Goodlad: British Nuclear Fuels Limited plc is required by the terms of its licence under the Nuclear Installations Act 1965 to satisfy Her Majesty's nuclear installation inspectorate of the Health and Safety Executive of the adequacy of the emergency arrangements for Sellafield, including Calder Hall. Evacuation is the responsibility of the police, who can call on emergency services as necessary. Those concerned will be considering if there are any new lessons to be learned from the recent severe weather conditions.

EMPLOYMENT

Small Firms

Mr. John Browne asked the Paymaster General what measures Her Majesty's Government have introduced since 1979 which directly assist the small firms sector.

Mr. Trippier: Our measures have concentrated on tackling the particular disadvantages faced by people setting up a new business or expanding an existing small firm.

Finance

The availability of finance to small firms has been improved by:

1. The loan guarantee scheme started in 1981, which aims to provide finance to viable businesses which fail to get commercial financial backing. Individual term loans up to £75,000 are made available for between two and seven years, with a Government guarantee on 70 per cent. of each loan. Small businesses in most sectors are eligible. The 1986 Budget extended the scheme for a further three years and reduced the cost to borrowers by halving the premium on loans.

2. The business expansion scheme, started in 1983, provides income tax relief on new equity investment in unquoted companies. The scheme was extended in the 1986 Budget and targeted better towards genuinely risky enterprises.

3. The venture capital scheme encourages the provision of finance by enabling individuals and investment companies to claim income or corporation tax relief on losses incurred on disposal of new shares issued by unquoted trading companies.

4. The enterprise allowance scheme, started in 1982, encourages unemployed people to start their own businesses. It pays an allowance of £40·00 per week for up to a year. More than 200,000 people have already started up businesses with the help of the scheme. There is now greater emphasis on business advice, counselling and training for people in EAS.

Premises

5. The small workshops scheme was designed to stimulate private sector investment in small industrial premises. From March 1980 to March 1983, a 100 per cent. initial building allowance was given for capital expenditure on the construction of workshops not exceeding 2,500 sq ft. The scheme was extended for a further two years for premises not exceeding 1,250 sq ft, and ended, as planned, in March 1985. Research indicates that the scheme led to a substantial increase in premises for small businesses.

6. English Industrial Estates Corporation has concentrated on providing premises for small businesses (up to 2,500 sq ft). Special rental and tenancy agreements have been devised to meet the needs of small businesses and entrepreneurs. EIEC works with a number of public sector agencies — the Department of Trade and Industry, the Development Commission, universities and the Scottish and Welsh Development Agencies.

Training

7. The Manpower Services Commission has provided training courses for the self-employed and small business man since 1977, but since 1984 the volume and range of provision has greatly increased to give over 50,000 training places in 1986-87. For business start-ups there are the business enterprise and new enterprise programmes; for established business projects there are the private enterprise and management extension programmes; and for graduates there are the graduate enterprise programme, and the graduate gateway programme.

Government purchasing

8. The Government have improved small firms' access to information about purchasing Departments, their procedures, requirements and points of contact. A Department of Employment booklet on "Tendering for Government Contracts" has been supplemented by some individual Departments' own publications and information published on Prestel. Tendering and approval procedures have been simplified by exempting suppliers to most Government Departments from normal approval procedures for contracts under £10,000, allowing non-approved firms to tender for non-urgent contracts subject to subsequent approval, and regular reviews by Departments of tender lists to encourage new suppliers.

9. The Ministry of Defence launched in 1986 a small firms initiative to increase competitive opportunities for small firms. This includes the creation of the small firms advice division in the procurement executive to supervise the initiative, provide a focal point for developing MOD policy towards small firms, and provide advice and assistance to small firms; a small firms research initiative to enable small firms able to generate innovative products and processes cost effectively to obtain a larger share of MOD research funds; appointment of small firms representatives to the boards of MOD research and development establishments; steps to ensure all local MOD purchasing officers are keenly aware of the initiative; and plans to hold a conference or regional seminars to explain the initiative to small firms.

Innovation

10. The Small Firms Merit Award for Research and Technology, started in 1986, aims to encourage small firms and potential entrepreneurs to bring forward highly innovative ideas that cannot attract existing sources of funding. This competitive scheme is being run by the Department of Trade and Industry on a one year trial basis in biotechnology and instrumentation.

Taxation

11. The ability of individuals to start businesses and develop them has been improved by a wide range of tax changes. Capital gains tax exemption limits have been increased to £6,300. Retirement reliefs have been extended to cover retirement at 60, retirement through ill health and disposal of shares in family holding companies of trading groups. Indexation has been improved and extended as have rollover reliefs. Reliefs have also been introduced to facilitate the incorporation of businesses, and losses on loans made for business purposes can now be offset against capital gains tax.

12. Significant changes to capital transfer tax were introduced between 1979 and 1985 to increase thresholds from £25,000 to £67,000 and increase rate bands. From 1981, only transfers within the preceding ten years were taken into account in assessing cumulative total CTT liability. In 1986, the charge on lifetime gifts was abolished and the tax was renamed inheritance tax with the threshold increased to £71,000 with further increases in rate bands. These changes will further facilitate the transfer of a business from one generation to the next without the need to dilute assets to meet the consequent tax liability.

13. Income tax relief is available on personal borrowings raised to make investments in partnerships, close companies, cooperatives and employee buy-outs. Relief is also available for interest on loans to partners buying plant and machinery for use in their partnership business.

14. Losses incurred in any of the first four years of trading by a new business carried on by an individual can qualify for special income tax relief. This can be obtained against earnings during a three year period before the new trade started.

15. Expenses incurred in the process of setting up a new business are now deductible from subsequent trading profits so long as the expenditure is undertaken in the three years prior to the start up.

Deregulation

16. Two White Papers "Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers" (Cmnd. 9794) and its predecessor "Lifting the Burden" (Cmnd. 9571) included detailed proposals for improvements in areas such as planning, VAT collection and employment law, and have generally aimed to simplify business dealings with Government. The enterprise and deregulation unit at the Department of Employment is co-ordinating action, for example in reviewing licensing and local legislative procedures, and a new system monitors the compliance costs of new regulations to business.

17. Planning authorities have been urged through Department of Environment circulars to approve applications for small business development, unless there are strong and specific objections. For example, Department of Environment circular 14/85 on development and employment reaffirmed the principle of presumption in favour of development, and urged planning authorities to have special regard to the needs of small firms and the self-employed.

18. Simpler and more flexible building regulations came into force in England and Wales in November 1985. Small detached buildings with floor area less than 30 square metres and with no sleeping accommodation are now exempt from control.

19. Measures have been introduced to ease the burden of employment protection legislation on employers, particularly small employers. A longer qualifying period is now required for unfair dismissal complaints.

20. Industrial tribunals are now required to take account of the size and administrative resources of a firm in deciding on the fairness or unfairness of a dismissal.

21. Changes to the maternity reinstatement provisions have included relieving firms with five or fewer employees from the obligation to reinstate an employee where it is not reasonably practical.

22. Redundancy rebates have been retained for firms employing fewer than 10 employees.

A number of changes have been made to Health and Safety Executive and Department of Health and Social Security regulations and procedures to ease burdens on small employers:

23. Raising the threshold for the requirement to prepare written safety policies to firms of 20 employees and above.

24. Giving specific training to inspectors to increase awareness of small firms' interests.

25. Designating one of the Health and Safety Commission commissioners to represent small firms' interests.

26. A small firms working group sub-committee has been set up to consider new leaflets geared to small firms, ways of seeking out unregistered small firms, and the training of local authority health inspectors in the problems of small firms.

Information required from small companies has been reduced by:

Information

27. Under the Companies (Accounts) Regulations 1979 particulars of turnover are no longer required to be included where annual turnover is less than £1 million.

28. The Companies Act 1981 further reduces the amount of detailed financial information that small companies must file with the Registrar of Companies and simplifies the arrangements for approval of company names.

29. The Government have announced their intention of relaxing the rules governing the amount of information small companies are required to disclose in their accounts within the constraints of EC law and Inland Revenue needs. They also intend to extend the Companies Act definition of a small company to the maximum allowed under EC rules.

Advice

30. The small firms service has been greatly expanded and improved since 1979. The service provides advice and information to small firms. Particular developments have included more small firms centres and counselling teams, a factsheet system, and a computerised database. Since 1985, the service has concentrated on specialist counselling skills and supplementing the work of local enterprise agencies.

31. Encouragement has been given to the growth of local enterprise agencies, independent private sector led organisations which provide help and advice to small firms. Full relief from corporation tax is given for business contributions (in cash or kind) to LEAs in the United Kingdom approved by the Government. A major five year scheme of financial assistance started in 1986, aims to establish a network of viable self supporting agencies. (Similar financial assistance has also been made available to LEAs in Scotland and Wales through, respectively, the Scottish Development Agency and the Welsh Development Agency.)

32. The Council for Smaller Industries in Rural Areas provides rural small businesses with advice through 32 offices on local opportunities and conditions, business management, marketing and technical advice, skill training and financial services.

33. Outside consultancy advice is subsidised in the business and technical advisory services run by the Department of Trade and Industry which provides subsidised consultancy to small and medium sized firms on productivity, design and quality assurance. BTAS was extended to include marketing from September 1986.

34. The business improvement services package of schemes, run by the Department of Trade and Industry, aims to help small firms in areas affected by job losses in particular industries — steel, textiles, shipbuilding, deep sea and tin-mining areas. Grants are available for consultancy advice on marketing, financial management, the application of computers and licensing in of products and processes, as well as for common services for groups of small firms and for investment projects.

Support in particular sectors

35. The Government sponsor the Co-operative Development Agency. Sponsorship of the CDA was extended in 1981 and 1983. The Co-operative Development Agency and Industrial Development Act 1984 extended the agency's mandate for a further six years and gave it limited additional powers.

36. The small engineering firms investment scheme operated in two phases to help small engineering firms to invest in certain types of advanced capital equipment. The scheme cost about £130 million.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Marlow asked the Paymaster General if he will tabulate by Manpower Services Commission region the numbers of long-term unemployed who have left the register since the restart programme began; and what was the figure for the equivalent period in 1985.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The following table gives the number of claimants by Manpower Services Commission region who ceased to claim as unemployed and who had been unemployed for over one year, between 10 July 1986 and 11 December 1986. The comparable figures for 1985 are for the period 11 July 1985 to 12 December 1985. This information is also in the Library.

The comparison of numbers of people who ceased to claim between July and December this year and the corresponding period last year is influenced by a whole variety of factors, including changes in the economic climate, as well as by programmes such as restart.

These figures are drawn from computerised records. Equivalent figures for claimants with clerical records are not available.

Engineering Industry

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Paymaster General if he will list the number of apprentices undertaking training by the Engineering Industry Training Board from 1979 to the present date; what has been the product of the training levy each year over the same period; and what steps he proposes to take to ensure more training and more skills for industrial areas generally and the west midlands in particular.

Mr. Trippier: The Engineering Industry Training Board maintains a record of those trainees registering for basic craft and technician training. The figures for the period from 1979 to the present date are given in table 1.

Total employment in the engineering industry has fallen by approximately one third since the late 1970s, and the proportion of people employed as craftsmen and technicians has declined by about the same amount.

Apprenticeship is not the only route of craft and technician jobs. YTS already enables a substantial amount of intial skills training to be carried out, and the expanded two-year scheme will provide increased opportunity for flexible training relevant to employers' needs.

The product of the Engineering Industry Training Board's training levy for each year over the same period is given at table 2. The totals are broken down into levy from the mainstream engineering industry and the Mechanical and Electrical Engineering Construction Industry.

Employers have the responsibility and are best placed to identify their own skill needs and ensure an appropriate volume and quality of training at all levels, but the Government are providing substantial help through its £1½ billion training programmes for young people and adults. In the west midlands region approximately £108 million was spent on training programmes in the financial year 1985-86 and forecast expenditure for the financial year 1986-87 is estimated at approximately £119 million.

Hazardous Substances

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Paymaster General (1) if his Department will set up an inquiry into the reasons for, and effects of, the recent chemical spillage in Southampton;

(2) if his Department has any plans to change the present regulations concerning hazardous substances in residential areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Investigation of the incident by inspectors from the Health and Safety Executive began within hours of the incident being reported on 15th January 1987 and is continuing.

Any implications of this incident for the relevant regulations will be considered.

Household Bleach

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Paymaster General what representations he has received on the inclusion of household bleach, under the classification, packaging and labelling of dangerous substances regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I have not received any representations about the inclusion of household bleach under the Classification, Packaging and Labelling of Dangerous Substances Regulations 1984. The provisions of the regulations apply to such bleaches.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Gazumping

Mr. Heddle asked the Attorney-General if he has received a copy of the Law Commission's conveyancing standing committee's recommendations concerning the practice of gazumping; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I have received a copy of the document referred to in my hon. Friend's question. I hope that buyers and sellers of houses and flats, and those advising them, will give favourable consideration to the pre-contract deposit agreement recommended by the committee.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Manufactured Imports

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of consumer expenditure is on imported manufactured goods.

Mr. Alan Clark: The proportion of import content of consumer expenditure varies from year to year. However estimates of finished manufactured consumer goods in the first eleven months of 1986 totalled £13·7 billion compared with £12·0 billion in the equivalent period of 1985. These figures represent 18 per cent. and 16 per cent. respectively of total imported manufactured goods.

It is possible to estimate the import content of consumer expenditure only as a part of a five-yearly compilation of input-output statistics. The latest figures relate to 1979 and the figures for 1984 are due to be published next year.

Airbus Project

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to announce a decision on funding for British participation in the A330/A340 Airbus project.

Mr. Pattie: The Government are at present aiming to reach a decision by the end of the first quarter of this year, and the House will be informed thereafter.

Japan (Trade Surplus)

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress made during Britain's presidency of the European Community to maintain pressures on Japan to act to reduce trade surplus.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) yesterday.

SCOTLAND

Community Physiotherapists

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many community physiotherapists are employed by each health board; and what was the date of the first appointment in each area.

Mr. John MacKay: Information collected centrally does not identify community physiotherapists separately. The total number of physiotherapists (whole-time equivalents) employed by each health board in Scotland is shown in the table below. Physiotherapists based in the community are included under the "non-hospital based" heading but some hospital based staff will also undertake community visits.

Physiotherapists: Whole Time Equivalent at 31 March 1986

Roads

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total mileage of trunk motorways in Scotland in use, under construction, and planned as at 1 April 1986.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is as follows: In use, 136; Under construction, 9; Planned, 28.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the total United Kingdom expenditure on roads is spent in Scotland.

Mr. MacGregor: I have been asked to reply.

Some 13 per cent. of total expenditure (capital and current) on national and local roads in the United Kingdom in 1986-87 is expected to be in Scotland.

Nuclear Fuel

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether his Department has made any assessment of the maximum length of time that spent nuclear fuel can be safely stored and monitored at nuclear reactor sites when severe weather conditions prevent safe transport to Sellafield.

Mr. Lang: Irradiated fuel can be safely stored and monitored at nuclear reactor sites for prolonged periods of up to several years.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether there have been any delays in the dispatch of spent nuclear fuel from nuclear plants in the current year due to snow and ice on the rail network.

Mr. Lang: I am advised by the South of Scotland electricity board that, because of the difficult road and rail conditions, a planned movement of irradiated fuel was postponed from Wednesday 14 January to Wednesday 21 January 1987.

Dornoch Firth Rail Crossing

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of the recent submission made by his Department to the European regional development fund in respect of the proposed Dornoch firth rail crossing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: The United Kingdom regional development programme 1986-90 is the latest United Kingdom document in a series required of all EEC member states as the basis for assistance from the European regional development fund. The "Scottish Profile", one of 17 volumes, includes all major infrastructure proposals which, at the time of preparation of the document, were believed to be potential candidates for the period to 1990. The proposed Dornoch firth rail crossing was included in order that the case for European regional development fund assistance should not be prejudiced in the event of British Rail deciding at some time in the future to proceed with the project.

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Pollock asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had about services for the mentally handicapped in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: On 8 January my noble Friend, the Minister of State, held informal discussions with representatives of Greater Glasgow, Forth Valley and Lothian health boards, and Strathclyde, Central and Lothian Regional Councils about services for the mentally handicapped in their areas, and in particular the prospects of increasing the rate of discharge from the larger hospitals of those mentally handicapped patients who would benefit from community care.

My noble Friend made plain that the Government envisage a continuing role for mental handicap hospitals for those patients who require specialist medical and nursing care. There will be a substantial role for both the health services and local authority services, and also for the voluntary sector, in the care of mentally handicapped people. Co-operation in both the planning and delivery of services is essential.

The Government recognise that, in the light of the continuing debate about this very important subject, it is desirable to encourage a wider understanding of their position as set out at the meeting on 8 January. Accordingly a statement of Government policy towards the mentally handicapped was subsequently sent to the Scottish Health Service Planning Council and to the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities. I have placed copies of this statement in the Library of the House.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police Vehicles

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of South Yorkshire as to how many car accidents there have been in South Yorkshire police area involving police vehicles in the last five years resulting in (a) death and (b) injury; as to the total number of people who have died as a result and as to how many of these accidents occurred in the course of police pursuit;

(2) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Hampshireshire as to how many car accidents there have been in Hampshire police area involving police vehicles in the last five years resulting in (a) death and (b) injury; as to the total number of people who have died as a result and as to how many of these accidents occurred in the course of police pursuit;

(3) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Devon and Cornwall as to how many car accidents there have been in Devon and Cornwall police area involving police vehicles in the last five years resulting in (a) death and (b) injury; as to the total number of people who have died as a result and as to how many of these accidents occurred in the course of police pursuit;

(4) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Kent as to how many car accidents there have been in Kent police area involving police vehicles in the last five years resulting in (a) death and (b) injury; as to the total number of people who have died as a result and as to how many of these accidents occurred in the course of police pursuit;

(5) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Merseyside as to how many car accidents there have been in Merseyside police area involving police vehicles in the last five years resulting in (a) death and (b) injury; as to the total number of people who have died as a result and as to how many of these accidents occurred in the course of police pursuit;

(6) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Greater Manchester as to how many car accidents there have been in Greater Manchester police area involving police vehicles in the last five years resulting in (a) death and (b) injury; as to the total number of people who have died as a result and as to how many of accidents occurred in the course of police pursuit;

(7) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of West Yorkshire as to how many car accidents there have been in West Yorkshire police area involving police vehicles in the last five years resulting in (a) death and (b) injury; as to the total number of people who have died as a result and as to how many of these accidents occurred in the course of police pursuit;

(8) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Humberside as to how many car accidents there have been in Humberside police area involving police vehicles in the last five years resulting in (a) death and (b) injury; as to the total number of people who have died as a result and as to how many of these accidents occurred in the course of police pursuit;

(9) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Nottinghamshire as to how may car accidents there have been in Nottinghamshire police area involving police vehicles in the last five years resulting in (a) death and (b) injury; as to the total number of people who have died as a result and as to how many of these accidents occurred in the course of police pursuit;

(10) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Cheshire as to how many car accidents there have been in Cheshire police area involving police vehicles in the last five years resulting in (a) death and (b) injury; as to the total number of people who have died as a result and as to how many of these accidents occurred in the course of police pursuit;

(11) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Lancashire as to how many car accidents there have been in the Lancashire police area involving police vehicles in the last five years resulting in (a) death and (b) injury; as to the total number of people who have died as a result and as to how many of these accidents occurred in the course of police pursuit.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Information on accidents involving police vehicles giving rise to death or injury has not previously been available centrally, but statistics are being collected centrally with effect from 1 January 1987. The chief constables for nine police forces have been able to supply the information given in the table below for accidents involving police vehicles in 1986. Information for previous years could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The chief constables of Kent, and of Devon and Cornwall, have not been able to provide the information requested.

Alcohol Consumption

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on the annual alcohol consumption per head in each of the member countries of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Waddington: Information on alcohol consumption per head is not collected on a regular basis by the statistical office of the European Communities. However the Brewers Society publishes information of this kind in its annual statistical handbook. Table K7 of the 1985 edition, a copy of which is in the Library, gives figures of alcohol consumption per head in 1984 in each of the European Community countries (excluding Luxembourg). The figures for individual countries are inevitably subject to the margins of error which are inherent whenever different sources of data of different qualities and using different definitions are brought together.

Computer Network (Data Transfer)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) in relation to the planned computer network proposed by Electronic Data Systems, what kind of data he proposes to obtain from or transfer to the Department of Health and Social Security; what is the anticipated number of such transfers; and for what purpose those transfers will take place;

(2) in relation to the planned computer network proposed by Electronic Data Systems, what kind of data he proposes to obtain from or transfer to the Inland Revenue; what is the anticipated number of such transfers; and for what purpose those transfers will take place;

(3) in relation to the planned computer network proposed by Electronic Data Systems, what kind of data he proposes to obtain from or transfer to Her Majesty's Customs and Excise; what is the anticipated number of such transfers; and for what purpose those transfers will take place.

Mr. Hurd: A Government data network is being considered as a means of minimising the data communications, development and running costs of Government Departments (initially up to four). Electronic Data Systems is one of several companies which responded to a request for information issued by the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency on behalf of Her Majesty's Government. No proposals have yet been received, and a consortium which includes Electronic Data Systems is only one of a number of consortia invited to submit proposals. There are at present no plans to use such a network, if it were established, for exchange of information between the Home Office and the Inland Revenue.

Strip Searches

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to collect centrally and publish comprehensive information on the frequency of strip-searching of women held in custody, the purpose of each search, comparable statistics for strip-searching of men held in custody, the number and nature of unauthorised substances or items revealed by each strip search and comparable statistics of unauthorised substances or items revealed by routine security measures.

Mr. Mellor: We have no plans to do so.

R. v. Joe Benjamin

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he proposes to introduce legislation following the decision of the Court of Appeal on 19 December 1986, the case of R. v. Joe Benjamin, that a person may be imprisoned for refusing to be bound over to keep the peace following an acquittal and where the charge of breach of the peace has not been tried.

Mr. Mellor: No.

Electoral Areas

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the timetable for the further interim review of parliamentary constituency boundaries at present being undertaken by the Boundary Commission.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A further interim review of 55 parliamentary constituencies was announced by the Parliamentary Boundary Commission for England in December 1986. I understand that the commission's draft proposals will be published today and that, subject to the possible need to hold local inquiries and publish revised recommendations, the commission hopes to report later in the year. Once we receive its report we shall comply with our statutory duty to lay the commission's report before Parliament as soon as may be after its receipt, together with the Order in Council giving effect to its recommendations with or without modifications.

Mr. Derek Gordon

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if compensation was paid to Mr. Derek Gordon, following his complaint regarding his subsequently withdrawn confession to murder made to the west midlands police;

(2) what information he has as to action taken against the police officers responsible for obtaining a confession from Mr. Derek Gordon, while in the custody of the west midlands police at Bridge street police station, Birmingham.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand that an offer of compensation has been made to Mr. Gordon and is under consideration by his legal representatives.

The Director of Public Prosecutions examined the report of the investigation into the complaints made by Mr. Gordon and formed the view that the evidence did not justify criminal proceedings against any police officer. In addition, the Police Complaints Authority has accepted the view of the assistant chief constable of the west midlands police that no disciplinary charges should be preferred against any officer with regard to these complaints.

National Security

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how frequently national security has been invoked in immigration cases as a reason for removing or deporting individuals in each year since 1973.

Mr. Hurd: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Prisoners

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much was spent on assisted visits to prisoners in 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86, respectively; and what is the provisional figure for 1986-87.

Mr. Mellor: The expenditure in respect of visitors beginning their journeys from England and Wales was as follows:

1983-84	637,795
1984-85	702,808
1985-86	[1]818,283
1986-87	[2]864,400

[1] Includes expenditure incurred by the Department of Health and Social Security in 1984-85 but not reimbursed by the Home Office until 1985-86.
[2] Provisional outturn.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners at Wandsworth, Wormwood Scrubs, Brixton, Pentonville, Holloway, Winson Green, Leeds, Manchester and Liverpool prisons, respectively, spent an average of 20 hours or more per day in their cells in any recent convenient week;

(2) how many prisoners at Wandsworth, Wormwood Scrubs, Brixton, Pentonville, Holloway, Winson Green, Leeds, Manchester and Liverpool prisons, respectively, spent on average 23 hours a day in their cells in any recent convenient week.

Mr. Mellor: Time spent out of cells by individual prisoners (and therefore time spent in cells) is extremely difficult to measure. Prisoners leave their cells for regular regime occupational activities and the "take-up" of these activities is monitored regularly, but time spent out of cells for short-term activities is much more difficult to check. The information requested and set out in the table below has been collated locally on an ad hoc basis.

Establishment	Week commencing	Number of prisoners who spent on average 20 hours a day in their cells	Number of prisoners who spent on average 23 hours a day in their cells
Wandsworth	11 January 1987	[1]1,100	—
Wormwood Scrubs	18 January 1987	35	—
Brixton	18 January 1987	[2]274	—
Pentonville	4 January 1987	100	—
Holloway	11 January 1987	9	—
Birmingham	14 December 1986	330	[3]20
Leeds	4 January 1987	600	—
Manchester	4 January 1987	925	—
Liverpool	11 January 1987	[4]647	—

[1] Including 20 in hospital cellular accommodation.
[2] Including 14 in hospital cellular accommodation.
[3] Category A prisoners in hospital cellular accommodation.
[4] Including 36 in hospital cellular accommodation.

"The Secret Society"

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what advice his Department gave the Director General of the British Broadcasting Corporation concerning the broadcast of a programme in the British Broadcasting Corporation's series "The Secret Society", dealing with a Ministry of Defence project.

Mr. Hurd: My Department has had no contact with the BBC about this programme.

Smoking (Prosecutions)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of prosecutions in England and Wales in each of the last three years brought in respect of (a) selling cigarettes to minors and (b) smoking in no-smoking parts of railways.

Mr. Mellor: I would refer the hon. Member to an answer that I gave the hon. Member for Colne Valley on 8 December at col. 82. Information about the number of prosecutions under British Railways Board byelaws for smoking in areas where smoking is expressly prohibited by the board is not separately available.

Mr. Roger Cooper

Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement concerning the British journalist Roger Cooper, who has been in Evin prison, Iran, without charge for the past year.

Mr. Eggar: Mr. Roger Cooper was arrested on 7 December 1985. British consular officials in Tehran have not been allowed consular access, apart from one brief occasion on 2 August 1986 when the consul was permitted to see Mr. Cooper through a glass screen.

Both we and the Swedish ambassador in Tehran have continued to press the Iranians to grant consular access as they are obliged to do as a signatory of the Vienna convention on consular relations.

We have not yet been informed of the details of any formal charges against Mr. Cooper.

Mr. Raoul Wallenberg

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received about the case of Mr. Raoul Wallenberg; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: None. We have, however, raised the case with the Soviet Government on a number of occasions in recent years. They have either refused to comment or referred to their 1957 note stating that Wallenberg died of a heart attack in 1947.

South Africa

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to participate in or endorse any official initiative taken by the Federal Government of West Germany in seeking to secure intervention in or making representations about the safety of mines in South Africa.

Mr. Eggar: We would be prepared to consider any specific request on this subject from the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany.

Diplomatic Immunity

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which the husband of a United States diplomat was sent home following the refusal by the United States Government to waive diplomatic immunity in respect of legal proceedings for alleged offences involving the indecent assault of a child; if he will identify the diplomat and her husband; when the alleged offences occurred; and what information he has as to whether any action is to be taken by the United States authorities against the individual concerned.

Mr. Eggar: The alleged offender was James Ingley, husband of Jane Ingley who had diplomatic immunity. According to police reports we received on 20 December 1985, he exposed himself to a girl of six and committed other acts in her presence on one occasion in October 1985. There was no rape or violence. In the absence of immunity we understand Ingley would have been charged with committing an act of gross indecency under section 1 of the Indecency with Children Act 1960.

We expressed our concern to the American embassy on 23 December and asked it to waive Ingley's immunity. It refused the request on 24 December but sent Mr. and Mrs. Ingley back to the United States on the same day. The embassy deplored the incident. It subsequently told us that Mr. Ingley had undergone medical treatment.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in respect of which relatives of foreign diplomats based in London diplomatic immunity is claimed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The Vienna convention provides that members of the family of a diplomat or of a member of the administrative and technical staff forming part of his household enjoy immunity from the criminal jurisdiction of the receiving state. We regard this as including the spouse, children under 18, and a few other relations, in exceptional circumstances. It is for the courts to decide on doubtful cases.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy toward relations with Governments who refuse to waive diplomatic immunity in respect of legal proceedings for alleged incidents involving violence, sexual assault, murder or other serious offences, committed by diplomats; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: We ask for waiver of diplomatic immunity in serious cases as defined in the White Paper on "Diplomatic Immunities and Privileges". An overseas Government may not wish to grant it as they are entitled to do under the Vienna convention on diplomatic relations. In such cases we require the prompt removal of the alleged offender.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list each occasion during the last five years on which a foreign Government have refused to waive diplomatic immunity in respect of legal proceedings against one of their officials for alleged serious offences carrying a minimum prison sentence of three years; if he will specify, in each case, the rank of the official involved and the Government he represented, the alleged offence or offences involved, the date or dates on which they were alleged to have taken place and the date on which the diplomats concerned were withdrawn from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Eggar: I regret this information is not readily available in the form requested. I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

PRIME MINISTER

Bury

Q26. Mr. Sumberg asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Bury.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

European Council

Q117. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the preparations which have been made for the next meeting of the European Council; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The next European Council is due to be held on 29-30 June in Brussels. It will be for the Belgian presidency to make the necessary arrangements.

Peterhead

Q169. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Prime Minister if she will make an official visit to Peterhead.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Television Licences

Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister which Ministers have television set facilities in their offices and other official locations; and who is responsible for the payment of the licence fee in these cases.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) on Wednesday 21 January.

Information about Ministers' television set facilities is not held centrally.

Telephone Tapping

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister how much was paid by Government Departments to British Telecom in 1985-86 for tapping of telephones.

The Prime Minister: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to comment on the detail of the operation of the interception arrangements.

Engagements

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 22 January.

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 22 January.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 22 January.

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 22 January.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 22 January.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 22 January.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 22 January.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

WALES

Housing

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will estimate the number of new units of housing accommodation necessary to meet anticipated demand in Wales over the next three years; and what resources will be available to meet that demand;

(2) what is the current shortfall in the provision of housing in Wales; and what are the figures for each year since 1976-77.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: There continues to be a crude surplus of stock of dwellings over households in Wales but after making allowances for regional imbalance, concealed households, demolitions, rehabilitation and other factors our current estimate is that about 13,000 new units a year might be needed. The figure is based upon new research carried out for the Welsh Office by the University of Wales Institute of Science and Technology. The estimate is based on a large number of assumptions and is accordingly subject to considerable uncertainty.

Gross housing capital provision in 1987-88 has been increased by 19 per cent. for the local authorities. Provision for the Housing Corporation has been increased by 22 per cent. for next year and includes resources to support private finance initiatives by housing associations as well as provision to maintain the corporation's normal programme of homes for rent. The private sector will make its own judgment on the balance between supply and demand for dwellings for owner occupation.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many houses in each local authority area in Wales (a) in the public sector and (b) which are owned by housing authorities need repairs costing £5,000 or more; and what have been the equivalent figures for each year since 1979.

Mr. Edwards: No reliable estimate of the numbers of public sector houses requiring repairs at a cost in excess of £5,000 is currently available. The 1986 Welsh House Condition Survey will provide estimates of repair costs for houses in the public sector which will include details down to district council level.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people are currently on the waiting lists of Welsh local authorities; and how many have been waiting (a) six months or less, (b) between six months and one year, (c) between one and two years, (d) more than two years; and what proportion each of the categories (a), (b) and (c) represent of the total.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information is not collected centrally.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many private and public housing starts have been made in each local authority area in Wales in each year since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information for the period 1979-85 is published in "Welsh Housing Statistics" (Nos 1-6), copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total amount needed to finance repairs of defective housing in Wales at current prices.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: It is impossible to estimate with any accuracy the cost of bringing the defective housing in Wales up to a satisfactory standard of repair. The Welsh House Condition Survey which the Department is currently undertaking is by far the largest survey ever carried out in Wales. The survey will provide the first detailed analysis of the state of repair of the stock at the district level and will give us valuable information to help determine future allocations to local authorities for housing expenditure.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage and actual numbers of houses in each local authority area in Wales were built (a) before 1890, (b) between 1890 to 1919, (c) between 1919 to 1945, (d) between 1945 to 1955 and (e) after 1955.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The stock of dwellings by date of construction for each local authority in Wales was not available.

The following table shows estimates of the total housing stock for Wales at 31 December 1985, by the available age bands.

Date of construction	Number of dwellings (thousands)	Percentage of all dwellings
Pre-1891	245	21·8
1891-1918	195	17·4
1919-1944	153	13·7
1945-1970	345	30·8
Post 1970	182	16·3

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the percentage change in the level of housing subsidy to local authorities in Wales between 1979 and 1986 in real and cash terms.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The level of housing subsidies paid to local authorities in Wales has reduced by 79 per cent. between 1979-80 and 1986-87 (estimated). This represents a reduction of 87 per cent. in real terms.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the average housing capital expenditure per 1,000 population based on a current definition of population at capital outturn for each financial year since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Gross housing capital expenditure in Wales per 1,000 population for the period 1979-80 to 1985-86 was as follows:

1979-80	54
1980-81	52
1981-82	47
1982-83	68
1983-84	96
1984-85	77
1985-86	66

The population figures used are the relevant mid-year estimates in each case.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales which local authorities in Wales have adopted the Audit Commission's suggestion in "Improving Council House Maintenance", that they draw up detailed five-year plans for the maintenance of their housing stocks.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is not collected centrally. However, we welcome the thrust of this report which complements the efforts the Welsh Office is making to improve the delivery of housing services to council tenants in Wales.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the latest figures for the total housing stock in Wales, the total number and percentage of dwellings that are unfit and the number and percentage of dwellings which lack basic amenities in each housing authority area; and if he will publish the figures for each year since since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The stock of dwellings since 1979 is shown in the following table. The figures for 1981 and subsequent years are based on the results of the 1981 population census.

Year	All tenures (thousands)
December 1979	1,062
December 1980	1,068
December 1981	1,089
December 1982	1,096
December 1983	1,103
December 1984	1,112
December 1985	1,120

Detailed information on the condition of housing in Wales has been obtained from the 1981 Welsh House Condition Survey which provides the following estimates of the number of unfit dwellings and dwellings lacking amenities at county level. The 1986 Welsh House Condition Survey is designed to update the 1981 analysis and to provide details at district council level.

[1] Wales total differs due to rounding.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing how many houses specifically designed for disabled people have been built in each housing authority area in Wales in each quarter since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is not readily available and a reply will be sent as soon as possible.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many permanent staff in the Welsh Office have experience of housing management.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: None. However, the Department has access to very substantial experience in housing management through the consultants engaged for the priority estates programme.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will set out at constant prices the change in subsidies and capital investment in housing in Wales between 1976-77 and 1986-87, showing the subsidy as a percentage of investment.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Housing subsidies paid to local authorities in Wales have reduced by 88 per cent. in real terms between 1976-77 and 1986-87 (estimated). Gross housing capital expenditure has reduced by 38 per cent. in real terms over the same period. Housing subsidies represented 30 per cent. of gross housing capital expenditure in 1976-77 and 6 per cent. in 1986-87.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing the figures for (a) the total number of people, (b) the total number of people over the age of 65 years and (c) the total number of children under 15 years of age and living in dwellings which are unfit; and if he will publish the figures for those in categories (a), (b) and (c), living in dwellings lacking one or more basic amenities in each housing authority area for each year since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: It is not possible to estimate reliably from existing sources the numbers of people living in dwellings which are unfit or lacking amenities.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the gross domestic fixed capital formation in dwellings per head of population for Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Gross domestic fixed capital formation on local authority dwellings in Wales per head of population is estimated to total £12·17 in 1986-87.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will set out a table showing, for each local authority in Wales (a) its actual housing investment expenditure and (b) the total housing investment programme allocation available to it for the last full financial year.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is shown in the following table:

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many houses were built (a) by local authorities, (b) by independent housing authorities and (c) by private companies in each local authority area in each year since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The required information on housing completions for the period 1979 to 1985 is published in "Welsh Housing Statistics" (Nos. 1 to 6), copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales, if he will list in the Official Report the locations and numbers of untenanted local authority houses; and how long they have been vacant.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information is given in the following table:

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list in the Official Report the number of houses completed in Wales each year since 1961 including the totals for the first three-quarters of 1986.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The number of completed dwellings in Wales since 1961 is given in the following table:

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will set out the notional housing revenue account for Wales for the current financial year and the estimates made in respect of the next financial year; and if he will list the assumptions contained therein.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Based on the latest returns made by local authorities to the Welsh Office, the estimated housing revenue account for Wales for the current year is set out in the following table. Similar information is not available at this stage for 1987-88; the relevant local authority returns will not be available until the early autumn.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the amounts of exchequer housing subsidies and non-statutory rate fund contributions in each year since 1979-80 both in outturn terms and at 1986-87 prices for each local authority in Wales and in total for Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Based on returns made by local authorities to the Welsh Office, the information as estimated in the following tables.

The figures in the table showing rate fund contributions exclude statutory contributions made in respect of rent rebates.

The amounts shown at 1986-87 prices have been derived by the application of the GDP market price deflators.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the value of Exchequer housing subsidies and rate fund contributions per local authority dwelling in Wales for each year from 1978-79 to 1986-87 in outturn terms and at 1986-87 prices.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Based on returns made by local authorities to the Welsh Office, the information is estimated to be as follows:

	Central Government Subsidy Entitlement		£ per annum per dwelling Rate Fund Contributions[1]
	Outturn Prices	1986-87 Prices	Outturn Prices	1986-87 Prices
1978-79	174	339	20	39

[1] Excluding statutory contributions in respect of rent rebates.

The amounts shown at 1986-87 prices have been derived by the application of the GDP market price deflators.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give an estimate of how many more dwellings than households there are in Wales at present; and what are the figures for each year since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The difference between the number of dwellings and the number of households in Wales in each year since 1979 is shown in the following table:

Year	Number of dwellings minus number of households ('000s)
1979	65
1980	61
1981	77
1982	80
1983	83
1984	84
1985	85

Homelessness

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many people were accepted as homeless by each local authority in Wales in 1986; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1979;

(2) how many homeless persons were housed by each of the Welsh housing authorities in Wales in each year since 1979; and what proportion of those accepted as homeless in each area they represent.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is not immediately available. I will reply as soon as possible.

Education Act 1980

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those voluntary projects, organisations and bodies he has funded in Wales since 1979 along with the amount allocated, other than those which he has financed under section 21 of the Education Act 1980, listing those Welsh language projects, organisations and bodies separately.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Higher Education

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many students are in full-time higher education in Wales at present; and what are the figures for each year since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The available information on the numbers of full-time and sandwich students at the University of Wales and those on advanced further education at other further education establishments in Wales are as follows:

Year	Number
1979-80	27,161
1980-81	28,204
1981-82	28,851
1982-83	29,069
1983-84	29,582
1984-85	30,482
1985-86	31,855

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the proportion of 18 to 19-year-olds entering full-time higher education in Wales; and what are the figures for each year since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information on the number of 18 and 19-year-old initial entrants from Wales to higher education is not readily available. However, information on the number of 18 and 19-year-olds in Wales who are full-time and sandwich students at the University of Wales or on full-time and sandwich courses at other further education establishments in Wales is shown in the following table:

Academic Year	Full-time and sandwich students, aged 18 and 19, on higher education courses in Wales	As percentage of estimated total of 18 and 19-year-old population in Wales
1980-81	8,442	9·5
1981-82	8,461	9·2
1982-83	8,994	9·6
1983-84	9,192	9·4
1984-85	9,699	10·3
1985-86	9,878	10·9

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) whether his Department has carried out any investigation into the change in pupil achievement following the Government's increased support for the assisted places scheme in Wales;

(2) what assessment his Department has carried out into the effects of its policy of increased support of assisted pupils on the education system in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Changes in individual pupils' achievements cannot be measured directly. However, the Government are satisfied that the broadening of educational opportunities provided by the scheme has been wholly beneficial.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many pupils from each local education authority area in Wales who have been awarded assisted places at independent schools have dropped out of the scheme in each year since its inception.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is not available.

Arts (Grant)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the change in the total grant by the Welsh local authorities to the arts between 1979 and 1986 in real and in cash terms.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information about grants by local authorities to the arts is collected and published by CIPFA in "Leisure and Recreation Statistics", (1986/87 columns 171 to 183). This publication, together with those of previous years, is held in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the projected change in his Department's total grant to the arts between 1986-87 and 1987-88 in real terms and in cash terms.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The central Government element of public expenditure provision for arts and libraries within the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Wales is planned to rise from £11·6 million in 1986-87 to £16·6 million in 1987-88. The comparable figures at 1985-86 prices are £11·3 million and £15·5 million respectively.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish an analysis of the expenditure shown in table 3.17 of "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1987-88 to 1989-90", Cmnd. 56 II, on a similar basis to tables 3.4, 3.5, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.12, 3.13 and 3.14 of the same publication.

Mr. Edwards: The information is set out in the following tables. In all the tables the totals have been derived from unrounded figures and thus the components may not always add exactly to the totals shown.

TRANSPORT

Remould Tyres

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on the effectiveness of the voluntary procedure for recalling defective remould tyres, in the light of the case of Messrs. Arvoland of Cambridge, now in receivership; if he has any proposals for the introduction of a mandatory system for warning the user of the potential dangers of such tyres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am satisfied with the general operation of the voluntary code of practice for tyre recalls, and with its application in the case of Arvoland Ltd. until this firm went into receivership. These arrangements provide for departmental publicity when necessary. I see no need for a mandatory system of recall.

Crash Barriers

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what percentage of motorways in the north-west region have central reservation crash barriers; and what is the national percentage;

(2) what percentage of dual carriage motorways in the north-west region have central reservation crash barriers; and what is the national percentage.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Approximately 99 per cent. of motorways in the north-west region have central reserve safety fencing. The figure for all motorways in England is about 98 per cent. The only section of motorway in the north-west region without such fencing is a 4 km section of M6 motorway near Shap (Cumbria) where the width of the central reserve is greater than 10 m.

The percentage of all-purpose dual carriageway trunk roads with central reserve safety fencing in the north-west region is similar to the national figure of 10 per cent.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to provide dual carriageway trunk roads in the north-west region with central reservation crash barriers.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Further to my announcement in the Official Report, 17 December 1986, at column 537, I am reviewing the traffic flows on the dual carriageway trunk roads in the north-west region to establish where central reserve safety fencing should be installed.

A13 (Basildon)

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress is being made concerning road improvements to that part of the A13 which goes through Basildon.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This part of the A13 is not a national road. Its improvement is the responsibility of Essex county council.

Rose and Crown, Fosdyke

Sir Richard Body asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) whether he will state the date when he asked the district valuer, Boston, to value the property known as the Rose and Crown, Fosdyke, Lincolnshire, preparatory to acquiring it to enable the new bridge at Fosdyke to be built;

(2) Whether he will give the date when he received a suggested price for the purchase of the property known as the Rose and Crown, Fosdyke, Lincolnshire, from either the owner or the owner's agent.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It was in September 1985 that the Department offered to acquire the whole property, that is, not merely that part judged necessary for the works and already proposed for compulsory purchase. The district valuer was unable to agree a valuation with the owner's agent when he held informal discussion with him on 26 November. He reported on the difference to the Department.

In August 1986 the main compulsory purchase order associated with the scheme was confirmed. This included only a small strip of the property. Subsequently it was decided that the works were likely to cause collapse of or damage to the buildings. Accordingly, the Department published in October 1986 a supplementary draft compulsory purchase order in respect of the property. The cost to the Department of the order and associated public inquiry into objection to it is assessed at about £700. We are prepared to limit purchase to the additional land required for the works and to the right to demolish the building, provided that appropriate terms can be reached. A dispute on compensation can be referred to the Lands Tribunal.

Chinook Helicopters

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for transport what representations he has received regarding further civilian operation of Chinook helicopters, following the accident at Sumburgh, Shetland on 6 November 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have received a number of representations following the tragic accident to the British International Helicopters' Chinook near Sumburgh on 6 November 1986. As all aspects of civil aviation safety are the statutory responsibility of the Civil Aviation Authority, I have passed the representations to the authority for consideration.

A34

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is aware of any insuperable engineering difficulties to building underpasses under the roundabouts on the A34 by Newbury; and what estimate has been made of their likely cost.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Early studies included consideration of a continuous underpass on the A34 by Newbury. Because of poor ground conditions, the River Kennet and the high water table, and nearby development, the cost was estimated then to be in excess of £30 million. A full central route scheme, with a tunnel, was then estimated to be about three times more expensive than a bypass and was not therefore pursued.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated volume of traffic using the A34 daily between the junction 13 turn-off from the M4 to the Sandleford roundabout; what is the estimated maximum number of vehicles this stretch of road is designed to carry; and what assessment has been made of the effect on traffic volumes of making the A34 by Newbury into a three-lane highway.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Traffic flows on the sections of A34 between the M4 and the Pinchington Lane roundabout in 1983 were in the range 17,000-32,000 vehicles per 12-hour average weekday. The range is forecast to rise to 22,000-52,000 by 2006, without a bypass.

The capacity of the road is determined by the rate at which traffic can pass through the roundabouts. The maximum flow approaching the Robin Hood roundabout from the south has been measured at 2,500 vehicles per hour with a long queue. This compares with an operating level of at least 4,800 for one carriageway of a dual three-lane urban road without junctions.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what studies have been carried out by his Department into replacing the roundabout on the A34 by the Robin Hood public house to enable north-south traffic to be separated from traffic flowing into and out of Newbury; if he will give costings for the work; and what consideration has been given to improving traffic flow at the other roundabout on the Newbury stretch of the road.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The possibility of separating north-south A34 traffic was considered prior to public consultation. An option passing under the Robin Hood roundabout, bypassing the central roundabout and joining a modified southern roundabout, was rejected because of traffic problems during construction, the effect on commercial interests and the substantially higher cost estimated at the time as more than £20 million.

Railways (Electrification)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his latest discussions with British Rail on the proposed London-Edinburgh-Linlithgow-Falkirk-Glasgow and London-Edinburgh-Fauldhouse-Glasgow electrified lines.

Mr. David Mitchell: As I told the hon. Member on 12 December, BR is studying the possibility of electrification between Edinburgh and Glasgow, but I have received no proposals. British Rail is well aware of the need to examine thoroughly all the potential implications.

EC (Investment Projects)

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Transport what major investment projects his Department has identified for possible support from European Community funds.

Mr. Moore: The Department has submitted to the European Commission details of a number of road and rail projects, as well as some port and airport projects, in the context of the Community's programme of support for transport infrastructure projects. Various transport projects in, or directly serving, assisted areas have also been submitted for support from the European regional development fund. The Government continually seek eligible transport projects with a view to putting them forward for ERDF assistance.

Foreigners (Driving Restrictions)

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are the licence requirements of foreigners who drive on United Kingdom roads during holidays taken in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Michael Spicer: In common with international practice, visitors to this country who hold a valid foreign domestic driving licence or international driving permit may drive any vehicle covered by that document for a maximum period of 12 months.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Transport if there are any age restrictions on foreign nationals visiting the United Kingdom for holidays driving on United Kingdom roads; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: There is a requirement that visitors driving in this country must have reached the appropriate minimum age specified for GB licence holders for driving the vehicles the foreign licence or permit covers the person to drive, except in the case of certain heavy motor vehicles.

Helicopter Accident, Sumburgh

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress is being made with the investigation and inquiries into the accident involving a Boeing Vertol 234 (Chinook) helicopter at Sumburgh, Shetland on 6 November 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The investigation of aircraft accidents is the responsibility of the Department's chief inspector of accidents, who has an independent position in carrying out his investigations, which, by law, have to be held in private. It is thus not appropriate for me to make statements about the evidence being gathered and considered during an investigation.

However, the chief inspector issued a special bulletin on 13 November which said that the accident resulted from a catastrophic fatigue of a gear in the forward rotor gearbox. Information passed by the accidents investigation branch to the Civil Aviation Authority has enabled it, acting with the United States Federal Aviation Administration and the aircraft's manufacturer, to take appropriate airworthiness action. Meanwhile, the investigation into the precise mechanism of the gear failure continues and a report will be published in the usual way once the investigation is complete.

Road Accidents (Statistics)

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many motorists were (a) killed and (b) injured in driving accidents in (i) England and (ii) the county of Avon in each of the following years: 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985 and 1986 respectively.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, of 19 January 1987, c. 388]: The number of drivers and passengers of all motor vehicles killed and injured in England and the county of Avon for the years 1982 to 1985 are given in the tables. We do not yet have the 1986 figures.

ENVIRONMENT

Countryside (Planning Controls)

56. Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will seek to extend planning controls over the countryside.

Mr. Waldegrave: As we affirmed in chapter 5 of "Building Businesses . . . Not barriers" (Cmnd. 9794), we will continue to bring forward measures to ensure that the planning system is effective where careful control of development is warranted. This principle was reflected in the extension last November to all national parks of controls over the design, external appearance and siting of farm and forestry buildings and roads. My right hon. Friend also announced last November proposals for additional planning control over new livestock buildings near residential and other property.

Listed Walls

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what criteria he uses in deciding whether or not to allow planning consent to alter the structure of listed walls.

Mr. Waldegrave: Listed building consent is required if works involve the demolition, alteration or extension of a listed building in a manner which would affect its character as a building of special architectural or historic interest.

Each application is considered on its own merits. General guidance on the criteria to be taken into account when applications are being considered may be found in paragraph 63 of DOE Circular 23/77, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what regulations govern the building of houses against listed walls.

Mr. Waldegrave: Section 28 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 requires local planning authorities to give publicity to any planning applications which would affect the setting of a listed building. Any representations received have to be taken into account by the local planning authority when it is deciding the application. General guidance to local planning authorities on the criteria to be followed when considering applications is set out in paragraphs 25-26 of DOE Circular 23/77, a copy of which is in the Library.

Greenpeace (Correspondence)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to respond to letters despatched to his office by Greenpeace (a) dated 8 August 1986 on the unified pollution inspectorate, and (b) dated 31 October 1986 on the international conference on protection of the North sea.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have written to the hon. Member.

Fisheries (Nuclear Contamination)

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from the fishing industry both in the United Kingdom and in Europe expressing concern over the economic impact on that industry of the contamination of the sea by Sellafield and Dounreay.

Mr. Waldegrave: No such representations have been received.

Park Vista, Greenwich

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any information as to whether the Nature Conservancy Council is considering the designation of the walled garden in Park Vista, Greenwich as a site of special scientific interest.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am advised that the Nature Conservancy Council has no plans to notify the walled garden at Park Vista, Greenwich as an SSSI.

EEC Directives

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made since 19 June 1984 on the draft European Community directive on the harmonisation of architectural qualifications; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: EC Directive 85/384/EEC on the mutual recognition of formal qualifications in architecture was adopted in June 1985. The United Kingdom was fomerly notified of this on 5 August 1985. Implementation is expected by August this year.

To achieve this, an Order in Council will be put before Parliament under the powers conferred by section 2(2) of the European Communities Act 1972. It will amend the Architects (Registration) Act 1931 so that the order can come into force by 5 August 1987. Officials have worked closely with the Architects Registration Council of the United Kingdom and have consulted widely in the preparation of the order.

The Government welcome the mutual recognition of qualifications. I see this particular directive as an opportunity for architects to extend their activities into other member states while safeguarding our own professional standards in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made on European Community Council draft directive (78) 449 on construction products since 4 June 1984; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Work on the draft directive (78) 449 has not proceeded following the European Communities Council resolution of 7 May 1985 on a new approach to technical harmonisation of standards and the European Commission's White Paper "Completing the Internal Market" published in June, 1985. In its place the Commission has drafted in consultation with member states a single directive on construction products, which differs from (78) 449 in containing essential requirements, expressed only in general terms with a minimum of supporting provisions. This draft is expected to be sent by the Commission to the Council shortly.

Assured Tenancy Scheme

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those organisations responding to his Department's consultation paper on the minimum level of expenditure to be prescribed under the extended provisions of the assured tenancy scheme introduced under the Housing and Planning Act 1986; and which of these organisations (a) said they were content with his Department's proposals for the minimum prescribed expenditure, (b) sought a higher amount, (c) sought a lower amount and (d) argued that there should be no prescribed minimum.

Mr. John Patten: The following organisations replied to the consultation paper:

Abbey HA Ltd.
Association of County Councils.
Association of District Councils.
Association of Metropolitan Authorities.

Barratt Developments plc.
Bolwell and Hayward.
The Bradford Property Trust plc.

Blackburn (Swimming Pool)

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement as to why the original decision by a planning inspector to refuse an application for the building of a swimming pool and sports hall by Queen Elizabeth grammar school, Blackburn, on land adjacent to Lamaark road, Blackburn, was quashed by the High Court; and when any new inquiry will be held.

Mr. Waldegrave: The inspector's decision dated 22 February 1985 was quashed by the High Court on 28 January 1986 on the basis that the inspector erred in failing to consider the evidence and argument as to the need for the proposed sports complex. The matter was referred back to the Secretary of State for redetermination and a further local inquiry has been arranged for 10 February 1987 before a fresh inspector.

Reema Dwellings

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the number of Reema dwellings in each local authority area, and the number still occupied in each case.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 21 January, 1987]: A list by local authority areas of the number of dwellings designated under the Housing Defects legislation (including Reema hollow panel) has been placed in the Library of the House.

Information received from authorities about their ownership of later types of Reema dwellings was published in the BRE report "Large panel system dwellings: preliminary information on ownership and condition" (B. R. Reeves 1986) and I am arranging for copies to be placed in the Library. We have no information on the occupancy of these dwellings.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will treat the problem of Reema construction in the same way as Airey construction, and make special resources available.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 21 January, 1987]: The pre-1960 Reema hollow panel system has already been designated under the housing defects legislation. Other more recent types of Reema construction are currently being investigated by the Building Research Establishment and further action will need to be considered in the light of its findings.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a special capital allocation to Leeds city council to enable rehabilitation or replacement of Reema dwellings to take place, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 21 January, 1987]: Following consultation with local authorities, I announced on 19 December the distribution of housing investment programme allocations to authorities for 1987-88. (Column 748-9.) It is for Leeds city council to determine how best to utilise its HIP resources and any other spending power available to it.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what research he has carried out into methods of rectifying defects in Reema multi-storey flats.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 21 January, 1987]: The Building Research Establishment is undertaking a major study of large panel systems of construction, including Reema. This will provide advice on how to appraise the condition of large panel buildings and on possible remedial measures. A number of papers have already been published and seminars arranged for local authorities; further reports will follow.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has had from Leeds city council on the problem of Reema dwellings in the city, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 21 January, 1987]: My right hon. Friend received no formal representations from Leeds city council about the problems of its Reema stock.

Multi-storey Flats

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will issue a circular to local authorities unable to bring multi-storey flats up to his recommended safety standards, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 21 January, 1987]: We have already issued advice to authorities on the safety of blocks of flats of large panel concrete construction. We will consider whether further advice is necessary in the light of the Building Research Establishment's continuing examination of the structural integrity and durability of such buildings.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Departmental Staff (Training)

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average number of days' training per year given to professional information technology staff within the Inland Revenue who are no longer trainees in the most recent years available.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The figure is 8¼ days.

Data Processing Staff

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many data processing staff are in post within the Inland Revenue; and how many of those are trainees.

Mr. Norman Lamont: At 31 December 1986, the Department employed a total of 856 professional data processing staff at the levels executive officer to unified grade 3; 199 were trainees.

These figures exclude all staff at levels from clerical assistant to unified grade 6 employed on non-DP work, as well as staff at data processor and senior data processor levels.

Electronic Data Systems

Mr. Cohen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer in relation to the planned computer network proposed by Electronic Data Systems, what kind of data he proposes to obtain from or transfer to the Home Office; what is the anticipated number of such transfers; and for what purpose those transfers will take place.

Mr. Brooke: Formal proposals in relation to the provision of a Government data network have yet to be received from Electronic Data Systems or from elsewhere in the private sector. If such a network is established there are at present no plans to use it for the exchange of information between Inland Revenue and the Home Office. There are also no plans for exchange of information between the Home Office and HM Customs and Excise, other than the properly authorised transfer on exising networks which provide an inquiry-only service on the vehicle keepers index held on the police national computer unit. A formal decision has yet to be made as to whether the PNCU network would be transferred to the Government data network, if it were established.

Mr. Cohen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer in relation to the planned computer network proposed by Electronic Data Systems, what kind of data he proposes to obtain from or transfer to the Department of Health and Social Security; what is the anticipated number of such transfers; and for what purpose those transfers will take place.

Mr. Brooke: Formal proposals in relation to the provision of a Government data network have yet to be received from Electronic Data Systems or from elsewhere in the private sector. If such a network is established it is expected that the Inland Revenue will, in due course, wish to use the facility, with appropriate safeguards to protect confidentiality, to transfer information relating to income tax deductions and taxable national insurance benefits between the two Departments. This information, currently exchanged on magnetic tape, helps the Inland Revenue to calculate the correct income tax liability.

The number of such transfers is primarily determined by the number of individuals who are in employment or receive taxable national insurance benefits.

If such a network is established there are at present no plans to use it for the exchange of information between Her Majesty's Customs and Excise and DHSS.

Mr. Cohen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer in relation to the planned computer network proposed by Electronic Data Systems, what kind of data he proposes to obtain from or transfer between the Inland Revenue and Her Majesty's Customs and Excise; what is the anticipated number of such transfers; and for what purpose those transfers will take place.

Mr. Brooke: Formal proposals in relation to the provision of a Government data network have yet to be received from Electronic Data Systems or from elsewhere in the private sector. If such a network is established there are at present no plans to use it for the exchange of information between Inland Revenue and Her Majesty's Customs and Excise.

Unemployment (Costs)

Mr. Evans asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any estimate of the cost to the Exchequer of the present level of unemployment in the north-west.

Mr. MacGregor: I regret that no figures are kept dividing benefit expenditure on the unemployed by regions.

Personal Equity Plan

Mr. Hirst asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has received about the personal equity plan scheme since its introduction.

Mr. Norman Lamont: 152 plan managers have already been registered by the Inland Revenue. Information of the number of investors is not available, but the scheme is being widely advertised and reports suggest that it has generated enormous interest.

Mr. Yeo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many plan managers have registered under the personal equity plan scheme.

Mr. Norman Lamont: To date, 152 businesses have been registered by the Inland Revenue as plan managers, and a further 13 applications are being considered.

Budget (Representations)

Mr. Canavan asked the Chancellor how many representations he has received about his forthcoming Budget.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My right hon. Friend has received a large number of representations.

Taxation and Incentives Policy

Mr. Adley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what study his Department has conducted into the effect of taxation and incentives policy on productivity.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Government's policy is to cut taxation and restore incentives. This will undoubtedly improve productivity and economic performance generally.

Marriage (Financial Disincentives)

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to remove the financial disincentives to marriage; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I assume my hon. Friend has in mind ways in which the tax system treats a married couple less favourably than two single people. The Green Paper "The Reform of Personal Taxation", published last year, discussed how these "tax penalties" on marriage might be removed. The Government are currently studying the public response to the Green Paper.

Value Added Tax

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what rate the standard charge of value added tax could be reduced in order to achieve the same yield as now if all exemptions, zero rating and exclusions were removed.

Mr. Brooke: For legal and technical reasons it would not be possible to charge value added tax on all exempt, zero-rated or excluded items. However, just over a half of all consumers' expenditure is subject to value added tax at the standard rate. If the tax were to apply to all consumers' expenditure, the rate could by definition be roughly halved to achieve the same revenue yield as now.

Taxation

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he plans to introduce a lower band of income taxation at 15 per cent.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I have noted my hon. Friend's suggestion but I cannot anticipate the Budget Statement.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what has been the value of mortgage interest tax relief per private dwelling in Wales for each year from 1978-79 to 1986-87 in outturn terms and at 1986-87 prices;

(2) what has been the value of mortgage interest tax relief per mortgagor in Wales for each year from 1978-79 to 1986-87 in outturn terms and at 1986-87 prices.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Personal Taxation

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many higher rate taxpayers there are in each of the counties in England north of the Bristol-Wash line.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1987, c. 231]: Estimates of the number of tax units (married couples counted as one unit) liable to tax at the higher rates in each of the counties in England north of the Bristol-Wash line are given in the table which follows. The estimates, which are for 1984-85 (the latest year for which county estimates are available) are made from small samples: where this means that the actual number of higher rate taxpayers may be more than a third higher or lower than shown in the table, the numbers are indicated by [1].

Income Tax

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what ways of getting information about a taxpayer's income sources other than issuing an income tax return to him the Inland Revenue is examining.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 19 January 1987, c. 412-13]: The Inland Revenue already receives information from a number of sources. The Keith committee put forward a number of recommendations on this issue, which are examined in the consultative document recently published by the Revenue.

THE ARTS

Arts Council

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Minister for the Arts what change he expects to see in his Department's grant to the Arts Council in 1987-88 in percentage terms.

Mr. Luce: Excluding additional abolition replacement funding, the percentage increase in government funding of the Arts Council in 1987-88 is 3·4 per cent. Total Government funding of the Arts Council is up by 2·1 per cent.

Government Grants

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Minister for the Arts what is the projected change in the Government's total grant to the arts between 1986-87 and 1987-88 in real terms and in cash terms.

Mr. Luce: I announced to the House of Commons on 17 November at columns 29-31 that the increase in total central Government provisions for the arts between 1986-87 and 1987-88 would be about 5½ per cent. In real terms that is an increase of about 1½ per cent., based upon the GDP deflator.

British Library

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Minister for the Arts what proportion of the Government's projected funding for the arts will be devoted to the British Library project at St. Pancras in 1987-88.

Mr. Luce: Final figures are still to be settled and I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Local Authority Grants

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Minister for the Arts what has been the change in the total grant by the English local authorities to the arts between 1979 and 1986, both in real and in cash terms.

Mr. Luce: Information on the basis and for the period requested, is not available. Estimates of net revenue expenditure on the arts by local authorities in England and Wales from 1979-80 to 1984-85, are shown in "Facts about the Arts 2" published in 1986 by the Policy Studies Institute.

Welsh Arts Council

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Minister for the Arts what has been the actual and percentage change in his Department's grant to the Welsh Arts Council between 1979 and 1986 in real terms.

Mr. Luce: The Government's funding of the Welsh Arts Council, through the Arts Council of Great Britain, has increased in actual terms from £4,579,500 in 1979-80 to £7,610,000 in 1986-87; in real terms the funding level has been maintained.

Library and Information Plans

Sir David Price asked the Minister for the Arts what he is doing to encourage the introduction of library and information plans; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: The library and information plan is a mechanism for contractual co-operation between all library and information services in a local authority area. Its purpose is to get maximum benefit from local resources.

The Library and Information Services Council commended the concept to me last year and asked me to encourage its introduction by contributing to the cost of drawing up plans in representative local authority areas. This I have been pleased to do.

Through the British Library research and development department, I am awarding Leicestershire county council, Staffordshire county council and the Northern Regional Library Bureau (an association of libraries in the North of England) £35,000 to encourage them to test this effective new means of co-operation. The British Library intends to match the awards which I am now making by further dispensations in 1987-88.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Crossroads Care Attendants (Exhibition)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department has considered an application for an exhibition relating to crossroads care attendants to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Services Committee, arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 16 to 20 February 1987.

Benefits

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total expenditure on supplementary benefit to pay for bed and breakfast accommodation for homeless families in England in 1985-86; what he anticipates the expenditure to be in 1986-87; and if he will give this information for (a) England as a whole, (b) each area of his Department and (c) each local authority area.

Mr. Major: I regret that this information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to which local authorities in England at present disregard war pensions and war widow's pensions when calculating housing benefit.

Mr. Lyell: All local authorities administering housing benefit are required by law to apply a £4 disregard to war disablement and war widow's pensions. (Regulation 16 of the Housing Benefit Regulations, 1985).

Information on the number of authorities applying a discretionary disregard higher than the statutory amount is not held centrally.

Mortgage Interest (Benefits)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will state the total cost of mortgage interest payments to supplementary benefit recipients for each of the years 1979 to 1986; and if he will show the total number of claimants for each year.

Mr. Major: Information is not available in the precise form requested. Mortgage interest payments have been collected as a separate item only since 1983. Cost estimates for previous years are based on owner-occupiers' residual housing costs (that is after the deduction of rates, water rates, and repairs-insurance) and include an element for ground rent. The information available is as follows:

Year	Claimants	Total Cost
1979	98,000	31
1980	134,000	71
1981	196,000	124
1982	235,000	170
1983	242,000	[1]150
1984	277,000	[1]219

Redundancy Payments Scheme

Mr. John Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is giving consideration to the withdrawal of the redundancy payments scheme.

Mr. Newton: No.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the answer of 19 January Official Report columns 427-28 to the hon. Member for Oldham, West on the hospital beds breakdown for 1985, what were the figures for the same regions and specialties in 1979, and what has been the percentage change in each case from 1979 to 1985.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Disabled People (Domestic Assistance Addition)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the reply to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe, on 18 December, Official Report, column 706, if disabled people in receipt of the domestic assistance addition after April 1988 under the transitional protection will also be eligible for the severe disability premium.

Mr. Major: Yes, although in calculating the need for transitional protection account will be taken of the severe disability premium when it is payable.

Severe Disability Premium

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will define the term household for the purposes of eligibility for the severe disability premium; and if the presence of (a) an adult lodger or (b) an adult subtenant of the claimant will disqualify the claimant for the premium;

(2) if a disabled person receiving attendance allowance will be eligible for the severe disability premium if the only other adult member of the household is unable to provide assistance to that person on account of age or disability;

(3) if a disabled person receiving attendance allowance will be eligible for the severe disability premium for weeks in which the only other adult member of the household is absent from home;

(4) if the presence in the household of a student over 18 years in full-time education for whom no non-dependent deduction from housing benefit is currently made will disqualify a disabled person in receipt of attendance allowance from the severe disability premium;

(5) if a disabled person receiving attendance allowance will be eligible for the severe disability premium for weeks in which the only other adult member of the household has an infectious illness and would endanger the life of the disabled person if he or she provided the care and assistance required by that person.

Mr. Major: I shall let the right hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Disabled People (Talks)

Mr. Alffred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the issues discussed at and the outcome of the meeting at his Department on 21 January with organisations representing disabled people.

Mr. Major: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security and I had a constructive discussion with organisations representing disabled people across a wide range of issues concerning the effect of the social security reforms on disabled people. The disablement organisations have agreed to write to me setting out alternative proposals for the treatment of severely disabled people in the income-related schemes. I have undertaken, without commitment, to consider their proposals carefully. I have arranged for officials of the Department to assess the effect of the proposals when they are received, in discussion with representatives of the disability organisations. I have made clear my willingness to discuss the matter further with the disability organisations when this evaluation is complete.

Severe Weather Payments

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will publish the calculations of extra fuel consumption and costs on which his decision to fix supplementary benefit cold weather payments at £5 a week was based.

Mr. Major: The £5 payment is intended as a reasonable amount for extra costs, enabling speed of payments and certainty about the amount of help available. The principle of a flat-rate payment was considered by the Social Security Advisory Committee to be a particularly welcome simplification.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give (a) the daily mean temperature and (b) the weekly mean temperature for each of the weather stations used for calculating severe weather payments for the week 12 January to 18 January.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 20 January 1987]: The information requested is as follows.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, on the basis of what precise section of primary or secondary legislation he decided that all persons in the relevant categories would receive a £5 exceptionally severe weather payment in the week 12-18 January.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1987]: Exceptionally severe weather payments are made under the provisions of Regulation 26A of the Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) Regulations 1981 (S.I. No. 1528) as amended by the Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) Amendment Regulations 1986 (S.I. No. 1961). As I made clear in my statement on Tuesday 13 January, it seemed highly probable at the time that all persons in the eligible groups would qualify for these payments in the week 12-18 January. In a certain number of areas, the qualifying temperature condition was not met. Payments in these areas were accordingly made on ex gratia basis with the consent of the Treasury and within the normal conventions for payments of this sort.

Maternity and Death Grants

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether it remains the Government's intention to abolish maternity and death grants in April 1987;

(2) whether he has sought independent legal advice regarding the legality of the Social Fund Maternity and Funeral Expenses (General) Regulations 1986.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to my statement to the House today.

AIDS

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why he has not yet replied to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East's letter dated 20 November concerning the request for £10,000 for the development of a computer-aided-decision taking system for AIDS (CADETS) by the district medical officer for north Warwickshire in conjunction with Warwick university; and if he will reply forthwith.

Mr. Newton: My noble Friend replied to the hon. Member on 21 January 1987.

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to provide a full reply to the question of the hon. Member for Northampton, North about AIDS to which a holding reply was given on 12 December, Official Report, column 294.

Mr. Newton: I replied to my hon. Friend on 20 January 1987.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what evidence he has that the AIDS virus is transmitted in semen and vaginal fluid; and what evidence he has that the AIDS virus is not transmitted during the exchange of saliva in kissing.

Mr. Newton: There is good epidemiological evidence that the great majority of cases of infection with HIV (the AIDS virus) have occurred following penetrative sexual intercourse; virtually all the remaining cases have been associated with injections of infected blood, blood products or injecting drug misues. This evidence does not support transmission of infection through kissing. Non-sexual family contacts of infected people have not contracted the infection, in spite of kissing.

Transmission of infection has occurred following artificial insemination of infected semen: in this instance no form of direct contact between the subjects concerned took place.

The reasons for our advice on kissing are given in my reply to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 19 December 1986 at column 783.

Chiropodists and Speech Therapists

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in respect of each English district health authority the ratio of (a) chiropodists and (b) speech therapists per head of population in 1980 and at the latest date for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have such information as is available as soon as possible.

Social Workers

Mrs Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what arrangements are being made for approval of social workers under the Mental Health Act 1983, following the expiry of the arrangements to give transitional approval to certain social workers; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will make a statement on his Department's discussions with local authority associations, the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work and the National and Local Government Officers Association about the current Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work proposals for new training courses for social workers; what issues are still outstanding; and when he expects the full implementation of longer term arrangements for approved social workers under the Mental Health Act 1983.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Adolescents (Care)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has received a copy of the report of the British Paediatric Association working party on the needs and care of adolescents; and what plans and policies he has for the in-patient hospital care of adolescents.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Departmental Initiatives

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list initiatives by his Department which have been of benefit specifically to residents in Leicester.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1987]: Leicester has benefited, along with other areas, from the general increase in expenditure on health, personal social services and social security in recent years. The Department's local social security offices in the area are working in close liaison with major statutory and voluntary agencies, to improve the service to the public. For example, Leicester (Norton street) ILO has reduced the average clearance time for supplementary benefit claims from 15 days to 4 days since February 1986, and has recently introduced a fast-flow reception point.

The provision of health services in Leicester is primarily a matter for Leicestershire health authority and Leicestershire family practitioner committee. The health authority has experienced a real growth of 34 per cent. in revenue funding in the period 1978-79 to 1986-87. In 1985 phase 1 of the Glenfield general hospital became fully operational, and phase 2 of this major new development is to start later this year. Plans are now well advanced for the full computerisation of the Leicestershire family practitioner committees' records and it is anticipated that a fully computerised cervical cytology call and recall system will be instituted this year.

Leicestershire was one of the ten pilot areas for the centrally funded Asian Mother and Baby Campaign, under which link-workers are employed to improve access to maternity services by overcoming linguistic barriers between patients and staff. The Department is also funding a project in Leicester as part of its initiative to enable mentally handicapped children to be moved from long-stay hospitals. Under a central funding initiative set up in 1983, £360,000 was allocated to Leicestershire health authority over a three year period, to enable it to develop a comprehensive service for drug misusers. An additional sum of £94,000 has been allocated in 1986-87 for further improvements to the services for this client group.

Condoms

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report information available to him on the unit retail price for condoms in each European Economic Community country.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1987, c. 206]: The manufacturer's recommended retail price for a condom in this country ranges from about 16p-24p (including VAT). Information in this form for other European Community countries is not collected. Inquiries of a leading United Kingdom manufacturer suggest, though, that the unit retail price of their products is lower in the United Kingdom, sometimes considerably so, than in other EC countries.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people over retirement age in the Leeds metropolitan district council area were in receipt of supplementary benefit in 1984, 1985 and at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Lyell [pursuant to his reply, 16 January 1987, c. 346]: Following a reorganisation of work in October 1986, Leeds metropolitan district council area is now covered by the Department's five offices at Leeds east, Leeds west, Leeds south, Leeds north and Leeds north-west. The table shows the number of people over retirement age in receipt of supplementary benefit from these offices in December 1986, the latest available figures, and on comparable dates in 1984 and 1985:

Year	Number
[1]1984	24,956
1985	23,564

[1]Source 100 per cent. count of cases in action.

Prior to October 1986 some parts of the Leeds metropolitan district council area were covered by the Department's offices at Castleford, York and Harrogate. However, information is not available about the number of pensioners in that area whose supplementary benefit was handled by those offices.

NHS (Beds)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now take steps to prevent any further cut back in National Health Service acute beds.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 21 January 1987]: Since the inception of the National Health Service increasing numbers of patients have been treated in fewer acute beds partly because those beds have been more efficiently used and partly because of different patterns of care, such as increased day-case treatment, supported by increased resources. It is for health authorities to decide how much weight should be given to numbers of acute beds which are only one factor in a complex planning process.

Mentally Handicapped People (Homes)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance he gives to health authorities on procedure to be followed on the siting of homes for mentally handicapped people within the community; what discussions have taken place between officials of his Department and East Dorset health authority on this subject insofar as it relates to the proposed home at Broadlands, Ferndown; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 21 January 1987]: Health authorities (as Crown bodies) are not generally subject to the Town and Country Planning Acts, but, where the proposed development would normally require a planning application, health authorities are required to consult the local planning authority in accordance with a non-statutory procedure laid down by the Department of the Environment.

Health authorities are given guidance on care in the community pilot projects (Annex E of HC(83)6/LAC(83) 5)* that siting of any residential accommodation should take account of the need to establish community links with access to the same health, education and social services, shops and transport, as are normally available to other people living in the community. Guidance to health authorities about the registration and inspection of nursing homes* issued by the Department and by the National Association of Health Authorities is concerned only with the control of standards and not with location.

The only discussion between officials of the Department and the East Dorset health authority about the proposed nursing home at Broadlands, Ferndown, has been to establish the facts, as the matter was drawn to the attention of my right hon. Friend. I understand that the health authority, in strict compliance with the above Department of the Environment non-statutory procedure, consulted the local planning authority regarding the proposed change of use of the premises, and formal notification of the proposal was passed to the local authority on 23 September with the request that it be dealt with as a matter of urgency. This was because of failures to obtain other suitable properties in the area against competition from other prospective purchasers.

The great majority of mentally handicapped people have always lived in the community. The Government's policy is to achieve a major shift from institutional care for mentally handicapped people to a range of community care according to individual needs, but with specialised residential health provision for people with special medical or nursing needs. The Government's response* to the report of the Social Services Committee on community care (Cmnd. 9674) said that the statutory authorities recognised the importance of carrying the wider community with them when the objective is enabling vulnerable people to play their full part in the community, and be accepted as part of it, and that voluntary work by people of all ages, and the involvement of local churches etc. are encouraging a sense of belonging, participation, sharing and mutual respect. Mentally handicapped people themselves are often their own best advocates.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Forestry

9. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will review the criteria for releasing agricultural land in England for the planting of trees.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The criteria for releasing the transfer of agricultural land to forestry in England are kept under review in the light of all relevant factors.

54. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will relax his ministerial criteria for the release of land for forestry purposes.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The criteria for clearing the transfer of agricultural land to forestry in England are kept under review in the light of all relevant factors.

Mr. Steen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many acres of agricultural land have been used for that purpose in each of the last five years, distinguishing between agricultural use and forestry.

Mr. Gummer: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

10. Mr. Corbett asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to increase the present number of environmentally sensitive areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: On 18 December I laid before Parliament orders designating five English environmentally sensitive areas. If these areas prove as successful as I hope, the case for further designations will clearly be strengthened.

Cereals

11. Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans for the introduction of a set-aside system for cereal production in the Community.

25. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he proposes to make public his set-aside scheme for surplus cereal land.

48. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he intends to implement his proposals for a set-aside scheme for surplus cereal land.

Mr. Gummer: The Council of Ministers, under the chairmanship of my right hon. Friend, agreed in principle in December that measures should be introduced to divert land out of commodities in surplus, including cereals.

19. Mr. Raymsford asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects the Agriculture Ministers to discuss cereal surpluses within the European Economic Community.

Mr. Gummer: Discussions on the Commission's 1987-88 agriculture price proposals, which we expect shortly, are likely to cover the question of cereal surpluses.

31. Mr. Hamilton asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will make it his policy to oppose any scheme put forward within the EEC for quotas for cereals production.

Mr. Gummer: This is already our policy.

No Member state, nor the Commission, advocates the introduction of quotas in the cereals sector.

Common Agricultural Policy

12. Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the cost of the common agricultural policy in pounds sterling in the Council's draft 1987 budget; what reduction there will be in this amount as a result of the recent agreement on alterations for milk and beef; what further reduction in common agricultural policy costs arising from the agreement there will be in 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The provision in the 1987 draft budget for expenditure under the common agricultual policy is about £16·7 billion. The measures agreed by the Agriculture Council on 16 December are expected to reduce expenditure by some £650 million in 1987 and £230 million in 1988.

39. Dr. McDonald asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from the National Farmers Union concerning his proposals for reform of the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Jopling: I have received a number of representations from the National Farmers Union about the reform of the common agricultural policy, including those reforms agreed at the Agriculture Council on 13-16 December.

43. Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next expects to discuss the structure proposals at the Council of Agriculture Ministers.

Mr. Jopling: The timetable for further discussion of the socio-structural proposals is now a matter for the Belgian presidency. However, I expect further Council discussion of the package in the next few weeks.

45. Mrs. Shields asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the impact on employment and the rural economy in areas of Britain affected by milk quotas of the recent common agricultural policy agreement.

Mr. Gummer: It is not possible to judge precisely what will be the effect on employment and the rural economy of the measures agreed by the Council of Ministers last month. But they should create a greater long term stability in the dairy sector by bringing supply into better balance with demand.

46. Mr. Leigh asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is now in a position to give further details of the savings to the Community's budget as a result of the agreement on reform of the common agricultural policy by the Council of Agriculture Ministers.

Mr. Jopling: The Commission has estimated that the agreement on milk and beef, including the programme for disposal of butter stocks with deferred reimbursement to member states, will reduce Community expenditure as follows:

1987	−1,020
1989	−245

The Committee has also stated that the new socio-structural measures, which the Council agreed in principle, could result in net savings to the Community budget of about 520 mecu a year when fully in operation.

Rural Economy

13. Mr. Cash asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures will be taken to sustain the rural economy.

Mr. Jopling: The Government already provide a wide range of support for agriculture and forestry which helps to sustain the rural economy.

Agriculture-related Industries

14. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will now publish a White Paper setting out the detailed implications for the long-term development of all sectors within agriculture-related industries of the decisions reached at the Council of Agriculture Ministers on 15 to 17 December; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: Decisions reached at the Council of Agriculture Ministers in December primarily concerned the reform of the beef and dairy regimes. The Government will continue to use all appropriate means to promote its policies for CAP reform, which are in the long-term interest of all involved in agriculture, as well as of consumers and taxpayers.

Agriculture and the Environment

17. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action is being taken to reconcile the needs of agriculture and the environment.

41. Sir Hector Monro asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action is being taken to reconcile the needs of agriculture and of the environment.

Mr. Jopling: It is, and has been for some time, the Government's policy to integrate environmental objectives into the design of agricultural policy. To this end I have sought in my recent organisation of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service to ensure that it is in the best possible position to balance its advice on efficient agricultural production with advice on relevant environmental considerations. The new front-line Farm and Countryside Service will provide expert advice that combines all these elements.

Butter

18. Mr. Holt asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures will be taken to dispose of surplus stocks of butter.

21. Mr. Favell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further measures will be taken to dispose of surplus stocks of butter.

Mr. Gummer: Stock disposal measures are the responsibility of the European Commission. It has told the Council that its future plans concentrate on measures which will not disturb the normal Community market.

Agricultural Production

20. Mr. Lewis Stevens asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures are being taken to encourage more extensive production on agricultural land.

Mr. Donald Thompson: A scheme of aid to help reduce surpluses by encouraging more extensive agricultural production is under active discussion in Brussels as part of the socio-structural package.

My right hon. Friend will also be aware that orders have recently been laid before Parliament designating six environmentally sensitive areas in which certain forms of extensive production will be encouraged.

Milk and Beef

22. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received following the decision taken by the European Economic Community Agriculture Ministers to cut the level of production for milk and beef.

Mr. Gummer: I have received a number of such representations. Some point to the problems of individual producers, others to the overall success of these decisions.

Fertilisers

23. Mr. Evans asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what restrictions presently apply to farmers on the use of nitrogen-based fertilisers; and what plans he has further to restrict their use.

Mr. Donald Thompson: There are no general restrictions on the use of nitrogen-based fertilisers. The Agricultural Development and Advisory Service publishes recommendations on fertiliser use and encourages farmers to assess the requirements of their crops accurately, and to restrict applications to those times when the crops can utilise the nitrogen.

29. Mr. Rogers asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what studies have been conducted by his Department on the use of nitrogen-based fertilisers on farms and its effect on trees.

Mr. Donald Thompson: As indicated in my reply earlier today to the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) my Department is undertaking a number of studies relating to nitrogen fertilisers. This has included work on the responses of nitrogen fertilisers and other nutrient, on horticultural tree species.

Dairy Quotas

24. Mr. Livsey asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to announce the details of assistance to dairy farmers as a result of the cutback in milk quotas over the next two years.

Mr. Gummer: The Council of Agriculture Ministers meeting in December agreed to increase the rate of compensation under the Community outgoers scheme to 27·5p per litre spread over seven years and to fix compensation for the temporary suspension of quota at 6·5p per litre per year. Regulations laying down the detailed arrangements for these payments are likely to be approved by the Council in the near future.

38. Mr. Knox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a further statement about the operation of milk quotas.

Mr. Gummer: I made a statement on 17 December describing a package of measures in the milk sector that had been adopted by the Council of Ministers. This agreement is a major achievement which will help restore balance to the market and should result in substantial savings to the Community budget.

44. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many creamery workers he expects will lose employment as a result of the proposed 9·5 per cent. cut back in milk quotas in the next two years.

Mr. Gummer: I accept that the implementation of the quota reductions agreed by the Council of Ministers last month will be a painful process and may involve the loss of some jobs. The extent of possible redundancies will depend on a variety of factors including the industry's response to changes in the market.

Pesticides

26. Mr. Cohen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next intends meeting representatives of farmworkers to discuss pesticide control regulation.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I am available to discuss any items of major concern to farmworkers' representatives in the field of pesticide controls.

Cereals (Over-production)

27. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has any immediate plans to reduce the grain mountain.

Mr. Gummer: We shall continue to tackle the problem of cereals over-production by pressing for a restrictive price policy and other market measures complemented by a land diversion scheme.

Food Surpluses

28. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further action is being taken to tackle food surpluses beyond that announced on 17 December.

30. Mr. Charles Morrison asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further action is being taken to control the costs of the common agricultural policy beyond that announced on 17 December.

34. Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further action is being taken to control the costs of the common agricultural policy.

42. Mr. Latham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will make a statement on progress regarding the problem of surpluses since the statement to the House on 17 December by the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer).

49. Mr. Bellingham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures have been agreed to curb the over-production of food in Europe, beyond those announced on 17 December.

52. Mr. Hayward asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action is being taken to tackle food surpluses beyond that announced on 17 December.

Mr. Jopling: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply given earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley).

32. Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress was made in measures to reduce food surpluses during his presidency of the Council of Agriculture Ministers.

Mr. Jopling: Persistent efforts throughout our presidency to achieve reforms of the common agricultural policy culminated at the December Agriculture Council in considerable progress being made in tackling the problems in the milk and beef sectors. These results were reported fully to the House by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State on 17 December.

Agricultural Land and Buildings

33. Mr. Richard Page asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will consider re-rating agricultural land and buildings.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Rating policy is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. On 10 July 1986 a reply was given on this subject to my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, West and Torridge (Sir P. Mills) making clear that the Government have no plans for re-rating agricultural land and buildings.

35. Mr. McLoughlin asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the effect on farm incomes and food prices of a re-rating of agricultural land and buildings.

51. Mr. Yeo asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the effects on agriculture of re-rating agricultural land and buildings.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I refer my hon. Friends to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) earlier today.

50. Mr. Best asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received regarding the status for rating purposes of agricultural land.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Over the past year my Department has received five representations on the rating of agricultural land. Three of these asked for the extension of agricultural de-rating to buildings occupied by non-agricultural horses, one was in favour of retaining the current de-rating of agricultural land and buildings and one expressed opposition to the current position. Responsibility for rating policy rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Milk Prices

36. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to the percentage by which the milk price paid to producers has risen over the past three years.

Mr. Gummer: The average net price received by wholesale producers in the United Kingdom rose by 4·9 per cent. between 1983-84 and 1985-86. A further increase of about 3 per cent. is expected for 1986-87.

Less-favoured Areas

37. Mr. Maclennan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the prospects for producers in the less-favoured areas in 1987.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) on 17 December 1986.

Farm Incomes

40. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what will be the effect on farm incomes of the changes in arrangements for intervention buying of beef and support of production.

Mr. Gummer: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave today to my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart).

55. Mr. Wigley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, for the most recent 12-month period for which information is available, what was the percentage change in farm incomes.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Farming income in calendar year 1985 was forecast to be 43 per cent. lower than in 1984. The final figure, and a forecast for calendar year 1986, will appear in the "Annual Review of Agriculture 1987," which is to be published shortly.

Community Budget

47. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent assessment he has made of the effect of the emergency measures in the milk sector on the Community's budget.

Mr. Jopling: The measures on milk agreed by the Council of Ministers in December are expected to result in substanital savings to the Community budget, amounting to 2 becu over the period 1987 to 1989, and in the longer term to becu per year.

Agricultural Workers (Wages)

53. Miss Maynard asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his latest estimate of the average post-tax earnings of full-time employed workers in agriculture.

Mr. Donald Thompson: No information is available on the average post-tax earnings of agricultural workers: the tax situation of workers on any given gross wage will vary according to individual circumstances. In the 12 months ended September 1986 the average gross weekly earnings of regular whole-time hired men in agriculture in England and Wales were £141·10 for 47·1 hours.

Beef

Mr. Warren asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action has been taken to counter the problems caused to United Kingdom beef producers in the United Kingdom home market as a result of Irish imports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The Irish derived an unacceptable advantage from the devaluation of the green punt in the middle of the marketing year. The United Kingdom made absolutely clear its opposition to changes of this kind, particularly in the middle of the marketing year, and likewise made it clear that devaluation in Ireland would make necessary a devaluation of the green pound, which we achieved in December.

Veal Crates

Mr. Crowther asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he can now give an approximate date on which he expects to introduce legislation to phase out the use of veal crates;

(2) over what period he intends to phase out the use of veal crates.

Mr. Donald Thompson: We are currently seeking the views of interested organisations on our proposals to ban the use of veal crates, and would expect to be able to lay draft regulations before Parliament in next few months. We have proposed that the use of veal crates should be phased out over a period of not more than three years.

Intervention Stocks

Mr. Thurnham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the current level of intervention stocks.

Mr. Jopling: A note setting out the volume of intervention stocks in the European Community as a whole and in the United Kingdom separately is deposited in the Library of the House and is updated monthly. The Government promote policies which surplus production and storage.

Council of Agriculture Ministers

Mr. Maclennan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the meeting of the Council of Agriculture Ministers on 19 January.

Mr. Jopling: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on Wednesday 21 January to my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir Peter Mills).

DEFENCE

Foxhunter Radar

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of the Foxhunter radar.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The AI24 Foxhunter radar, which is being developed by GEC Avionics for the Tornado air defence variant, does not yet meet in full the requirements of the Royal Air Force. A number of problems which have arisen during the development of the radar have contributed to time and cost overruns.

The programme of work is being defined with the contractor to provide the basis for a satisfactory resolution of these problems and the achievement of an acceptable performance standard for the radar. It is the Ministry's intention to agree a firm price contract for the satisfactory completion of this programme.

Private Contractors (Security)

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence who will bear the cost of vetting for security the employees of private contractors under contract with his Department.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Government already meet the cost of any security inquiries which may be necessary concerning private contractors' employees. There are no plans to change this practice.

Central Ordnance Depot, Donnington

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has sought the views of the managers and senior officers of Central Ordnance Depot, Donnington, about the proposed contractorisation plans; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: A study into the feasibility of contracting-out administrative support functions at the Central Ordnance Depot, Donnington and its associated garrison has recently been completed. This is now being considered in the MOD and the views of local management on the report are being sought as part of that process.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will publish a list of those representations he has received which support the contractorisation plans for Central Ordnance Depot, Donnington.

Mr. Freeman: The only representations so far received on the Department's proposals for the contracting-out of administrative support functions at the Central Ordnance Depot, Donnington and its association garrison are those of the trade unions concerned and of members of the work force. They do not support the proposals.

Ships (Operating Costs)

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current cost of running and maintaining a Rothesay class frigate for one year.

Mr. Freeman: About £5·5 million at current prices.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average cost of running and maintaining a Leander class frigate for one year.

Mr. Freeman: About £6·5 million at current prices.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average cost of running and maintaining an assault ship for one year.

Mr. Freeman: About £12·5 million at current prices.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average cost of running and maintaining an ASW carrier for one year.

Mr. Freeman: About £33 million at current prices.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average cost of running and maintaining a type 21 frigate for one year.

Mr. Freeman: About £7 million at current prices.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average cost of running and maintaining a type 42 destroyer for one year.

Mr. Freeman: About £15 million at current prices.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average cost of running and maintaining a type 22 frigate for one year.

Mr. Freeman: About £12 million at current prices.

Air Defence

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will outline the procedure by which a Tornado F3 aircraft will be guided to a hostile aircraft approaching United Kingdom airspace so that it can locate and intercept it;

(2) if he will outline the methods by which hostile aircraft approaching United Kingdom airspace are located.

Mr. Stanley: Potentially hostile aircraft can be located by a variety of methods. The most common is by radars located on the ground, at sea and airborne, and these will include assets of our NATO Allies. The Tornado F3, like any intercepting aircraft, would be guided to its target by fighter controllers using multi-source target information. Details of sources and procedures are classified.

Trident

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the expenditure on the Trident programme in each year since 1979 up until 1 January at both current and constant prices.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I shall answer shortly.

Northern Ireland (Fatalities)

Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of the armed services from the county of Kent have been (a) killed or (b) seriously wounded in Northern Ireland since 1969.

Mr. Freeman: I regret that the information is not available in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Recruitment

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he holds concerning officer entry by type of school education for the different groups of regiments and services within the Army.

Mr. Freeman: The information readily available relates only to those officer candidates who have been recommended by the Regular Commissions Board for entry to the Royal Military Academy, Sandhurst for the Army as a whole.

The latest returns from the RCB for the period April-November 1986 show that 50·2 per cent. of the successful applicants were from the state sector and 49·8 per cent. from the independent sector.

International Communications (Cost)

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his estimate of the likely final cost of establishing an international communications network for the armed forces.

Mr. Younger: The armed forces employ a wide range of international communications networks. These systems are constantly being updated and the cost of individual projects, many of which are highly classified, varies.

Intelligence Gathering

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his estimate of the money spent so far by his Department in exploring the establishment of an intelligence gathering system for the armed forces.

Mr. Younger: The armed forces employ a wide range of intelligence gathering systems. These systems are constantly being updated and the cost of individual projects, many of which are highly classified, varies.

"The Secret Society"

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what advice his Department gave the director general of the British Broadcasting Corporation concerning the broadcast of a programme in the British Broadcasting Corporation series "The Secret Society", dealing with one of his Department's projects.

Mr. Younger: Advice was given to the BBC about security aspects of the proposed programme.

Electronic Surveillance System

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his estimate of the total cost of the project to provide the armed forces with an electronic surveillance system.

Mr. Younger: The armed forces employ a wide range of electronic surveillance systems. These systems are constantly being updated and the cost of individual projects, many of which are highly classified, varies.

Low Frequency Transmitter, Glengowrie

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence when his Department will install an extremely low frequency transmitter at Glengowrie, Scotland; and if he will estimate the cost of such a transmitter.

Mr. Younger: Subject to the outcome of a detailed civil engineering survey, which will commence in the spring, and to planning agreement, it is hoped to begin installation of a trial ELF aerial in the Glengarry forest later this year. At this stage a reliable cost estimate is not available.

Polaris

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department plans to improve the Polaris communications system.

Mr. Younger: We are entirely satisfied with the existing Polaris communications arrangements and have no plans for any major changes or improvements.

Member's Questions

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to give a substantive reply to the questions from the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras due for answer on Tuesday 13 January.

Mr. Freeman: I have replied today.

AIDS and Venereal Disease

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence over what period the 1st Battalion, Queen's Own Highlanders was stationed in Kenya.

Mr. Freeman [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987, c. 159]: The 1st Battalion, Queen's Own Highlanders was deployed to Kenya for an exercise which took place between 22 October and 10 December 1986. It was airlifted to Kenya on several flights, the first of which arrived in Kenya on 12 October. It returned to the United Kingdom, again on several flights, the last of which left Kenya on 18 December.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence when his Department and the RAMC respectively became aware that the AIDS virus was common in parts of Kenya.

Mr. Freeman [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987, c. 159]: Although a report in a medical journal in December 1984 had indicated a high prevalence of AIDS in Central Africa, the extent of the problem in other parts of Africa was not widely known either in general or by my Department or the RAMC until early 1986.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence when his Department and the RAMC respectively became aware that the AIDS virus could be transmitted by heterosexual relations.

Mr. Freeman [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987, c. 159]: The possibility of transfer of the AIDS virus by heterosexual intercourse was first known by the MOD and RAMC in 1984.

Based on the knowledge at that time, the risk of wider dissemination of AIDS through heterosexual intercourse was thought to be extremely low.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many of all ranks of the 1st Battalion, Queens Own Highlanders are known to the Royal Army Medical Corps to have venereal disease caught in Kenya.

Mr. Freeman [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987, c. 159]: It is not my Department's policy to disclose information on medical matters which is covered by medical confidentiality rules.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what orders or advice on the risk of AIDS from prostitutes in Kenya were given to officers and other ranks of the 1st Battalion, Queens Own Highlanders.

Mr. Freeman [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987, c. 159]: Following common practice for all units moving overseas, the 1st Battalion, Queens Own Highlanders was instructed on all relevant health hazards, including heart illness, malaria and communicable disease (which includes sexually transmitted disease and AIDS), by the mobile health inspection team prior to its departure. A handout was distributed throughout the battalion which highlighted the increased danger of association with prostitutes.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what orders or advice have been issued to members of each of the armed forces about the dangers of AIDS; and when they were issued.

Mr. Freeman [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987, c. 159]: In late October 1986 distribution began of copies of the Health Education Council booklet, "AIDS—what everyone needs to know". Every member of the armed forces is to receive a copy. It contains information on the disease and an insert advising anyone who believes himself to be at risk to seek immediate advice and counselling from unit medical officers. The booklet issue should be completed shortly.

Posters warning of the AIDS danger were circulated at the same time for prominent display in service units.

Since last summer AIDS warnings have been incorporated in all drug education briefing for service personnel.

Comprehensive briefing is also given by medical staffs to service personnel serving, or about to deploy, overseas on the dangers of human immunodeficiency virus infection. The surgeon general's staff has also issued through the medical chain of command, for distribution to all medical officers, DHSS booklets, 1, 2 and 3 "Information and Guidance on AIDS on handling of HIV anti-body positive cases".

Meteorological Office

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all the Meteorological Office weather stations, indicating (a) minimum night temperatures, (b) daily mean temperatures and (c) weekly mean temperatures for the weeks 5 January to 11 January and 12 January to 18 January 1987, respectively.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1987]: The Meteorological Office receives temperature data on a regular basis from some 600 locations in the United Kingdom. About 75 per cent. of these are manned by voluntary co-operating observers who submit their data only monthly in retrospect. Of the remaining 150 or so stations, a number either do not return observations for more than five days in each week, or are demographically unrepresentative. Moreover, to extract some 4,500 values manually to meet the hon. Member's criteria would involve disproportionate effort and expense.

However, data from the 67 observing stations participating in the DHSS exceptionally cold weather payments scheme, which are readily available in the format requested by the hon. Member, are provided in the tables for the weeks 5 to 11 and 12 to 18 January 1987. The minimum night temperatures for the same stations have been separately provided by manual extraction.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Universities and Polytechnics

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information is available to him regarding the mechanisms used by universities and polytechnics to measure the demand for graduates of particular subjects in universities and polytechnics.

Mr. Dunn: The main statistical information about the employment of graduates is derived from the first destination surveys of recent graduates undertaken annually by universities and polytechnics. For some employment (including teaching, medicine and veterinary science) there are national assessments of prospective demand, of which higher education institutions are informed. Careers advisers and academic staff in institutions of higher education have a wide range of contacts with potential employers locally and nationally, covering both the demand for graduates and the content of courses.

Education Officers

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action his Department takes to improve the training and professional skills of chief education officers and education officers in local education authorities; and what is the current annual expenditure on such programmes.

Mr. Dunn: The Department of Education and Science has no direct responsibility for the training of local education authority officers. Nationally co-ordinated management training courses are provided by the Society of Education Officers.

Human Embryo Research

Mr. Cash asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will direct the Medical Research Council, under section 2(1) of the Science and Technology Act 1965, to discontinue human embryo research.

Mr. Dunn: No. The Government's consultation document "Legislation on Human Infertility Services and Embryo Research" (Cmnd. 46, December 1986) invites views about those issues on which the Warnock committee thought legislation was necessary or desirable. This will assist the preparation of legislation for introduction in the next Parliament. At that time it is proposed to offer alternative draft clauses on embryo research to assist Parliament in resolving this matter on a free vote.

Home Education

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many children are being educated out of school and in the home.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not collected centrally.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what provision exists for the adequate supervision of those educated out of school and in the home;

(2) what guidance his Department has issued to local education authorities about how they should ensure that those educated at home are receiving adequate education;

(3) what guidance his Department has issued to local education authorities about the action to be taken by a local education authority when evidence of inadequate education at home is brought to its notice;

(4) what action is taken by his Department to monitor the performances of local education authorities in the supervision of children's education at home;

(5) what guidance the Department has issued to local education authorities about the criteria to be used in assessing the quality of education given in the home and to satisfy themselves that the parents are suitable persons to educate their children out of school and in the home;

(6) what arrangements exist when children who are educated at home leave the local education authority area for another; what steps are taken to ensure that the subsequent local education authority is aware that children being educated at home have moved to its area; and how these children are then to be academically assessed.

Mr. Dunn: Each local education authority has a duty under section 37 of the Education Act 1944 (as amended) to satisfy itself that the parents of a child of compulsory school age belonging to its area, whether newly arrived or otherwise, are fulfilling their duty under section 36 to ensure that he receives efficient full-time education suited to his age, ability and aptitude, by attending school or otherwise. There is no difference in the criteria for assessing school or home tuition. If necessary, authorities can enforce this duty on parents by school attendance order proceedings under section 37. These duties are straight-forward and, as for many others under the Education Acts, no need is seen for either particular guidance or the monitoring of authorities' performance. However, if my right honourable Friend were to find that an authority had failed to discharge its duty, he could issue a corrective direction under section 99 of the 1944 Act.

Examination Results

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what means are used to ensure that examination results at A and O-level in England and Wales are comparable between examining boards;

(2) what research his Department has undertaken into the disparity between the examination results at A and O-level of entrants of the different examining boards in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The GCE boards bear the main responsibility for ensuring comparability of the standards required for the award of particular grades at O and A-level. They are concerned to maintain the standards of their examinations and have undertaken considerable research.

The Department of Education and Science has undertaken no research in this area. However, the Secondary Examination Council (SEC) has been specifically charged with responsibility for monitoring the comparability of examination standards, and currently scrutinises A-levels for fairness and reliability. The SEC will undertake similar work in respect of GCSE examinations which will supersede O-levels and CS in 1988.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of entrants for A-level examinations of each of the examining boards in England and Wales in each year since 1983 have received (a) A grades, (b) B grades, (c) C grades, (d) D grades and (e) E grades.

Mr. Dunn: I shall reply as soon as possible with data for the English boards. Figures for Wales are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Schools (Expenditure)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing local authority capital allocations in respect of schools for each year since 1978-79, in cash terms, and in 1978-79 prices.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing departmental outturn expenditure on schools in each year since 1978-79, broken down between (a) teachers' pay and (b) all other costs, in cash terms and in 1978-79 prices.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The table contains the information. The figures for expenditure include that of central, as well as of local, government; the figures for teacher pay cover nursery, primary, scondary and special schools maintained by local education authorities.

Year	Total Expenditure on Schools		Teachers' Pay		All Other Costs

1984-85	8,285	4,656	4,946	2,780	3,339	1,876

Notes:
1. The cash terms for all the later years have been repriced to 1978-79 prices using the Gross Domestic Product (Market Prices) Deflator.
2. Teachers' Pay includes allowances plus the employers' contribution towards national insurance and superannuation.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing outturn capital expenditure on schools in each year since 1978-79 (a) in cash terms, (b) as a percentage of total departmental outturn expenditure on schools and (c) in 1978-79 prices.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information requested is set out in the table. The figures for capital expenditure are for all maintained schools in England. They comprise expenditure by local authorities and the total value of grant-aided work at voluntary aided and special agreement schools, including the governors's contribution of 15 per cent. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that over this period the number of maintained, schools in England fell from 28,000 to 25,000.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what were the totals of capital expenditure forecasts supplied to his Department by local authorities in respect of 1986-87 preparatory to his determination of capital allocations for that year for (a) basic need school places, (b) new schemes relating to sub-standard school places, (c) expenditure committed on schemes arising before 1986-87 and (d) all other school schemes; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what were the totals of capital expenditure forecasts supplied to his Department by local authorities in respect of 1987-88 preparatory to his determination of capital allocations for that year for (a) basic need school places, (b) new schemes relating to sub-standard school places, (c) expenditure committed on schemes arising before 1987-88 and (d) all other school schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The following totals are taken from the cash plans supplied by local education authorities to my Department in relation to all maintained schools. They comprise LEA planned capital expenditure and the total value of capital projects on which grant aid was sought by the governors of voluntary aided and special agreement schools.

	1986-87	1987-88
(a) new basic need projects:	36,884	59,512
(b) new improvement or replacement projects:	134,363	168,375
(c) committed expenditure:	222,865	243,351
(d) all other schemes:	158,926	181,855

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what amounts of outturn capital expenditure by local authorities in 1986-87 is estimated to have been spent on (a) basic need school places, (b) new schemes relating to sub-standard school places, (c) expenditure committed on schemes arising before 1986-87 and (d) all other school schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Total capital expenditure on education by local authorities in 1986-87 is forecast to be £529 million in England. More detailed information for 1986-87 is not yet available.

Universities (Academic Pay)

Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about resources for academic pay in the universities.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: When I announced planned provision for the universities in November I said the Government would be willing to provide some further additional funding for academic pay restructuring if structural improvements could be agreed at a cost that could be afforded (Official Report, c. 490). I thus recognised that extra provision would probably need to be made available. Negotiations had not reached the stage at which it was appropriate to include specific figures in the autumn statement or the public expenditure White Paper.

I am today informing the University Grants Committee that these additional resources will be £40 million in 1987-88, £56 million in 1988-89 and £71 million in 1989-90. These additions will be contained within the overall public expenditure planning totals already published in the Government's expenditure plans 1987-88 to 1989-90 (Cm. 56).

There will be no increase in these figures. Moreover, these sums will only actually be added to existing provision for university recurrent grant if and when:

a satisfactory new pay structure is assured, providing management with more flexibility to take account of the quality of lecturers' performance and recruitment and retention problems; and there is a firm commitment to improved promotion, probation and performance appraisal arrangements.

Higher Education

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the number of first year students in public sector higher education in England and Wales for each of the last five years for which figures are available, as compared with the number of first year students in the universities over the same period, and divided into the subject classification utilised by the University Grants Committee and National Advisory Body, respectively.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 15 December 1986, c. 389-90]: The information is shown in the following table. University figures for 1985 are not yet available. Public sector higher education in Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Member's Correspondence

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he is going to reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Newham, North-East of 23 December 1986 about Michael Hicks.

Mr. Mellor: My noble Friend wrote yesterday to the hon. Member.

Radioactivity Accidents

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Gwent as to what training the Gwent constabulary have received to deal with accidents involving radioactivity; whether the divisions of that force carry out regular exercises to deal with such accidents; and at what intervals such exercises take place;

(2) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Gloucestershire as to what training the constabulary have received to deal with accidents involving radioactivity; whether the divisions of that force carry out regular exercises to deal with such accidents; and at what intervals such exercises take place;

(3) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Gloucestershire as to what items of equipment are available for police use in an accident involving radioactive contamination in the Gloucestershire constabulary area listing the number of (i) dosimeters, (ii) radiac survey meters, (iii) sets of protective clothing, (iv) breathing units and (v) de-contamination units;

(4) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Gwent as to what items of equipment are available for police use in an accident involving radioactive contamination in the Gwent constabulary area listing the number of (i) dosimeters, (ii) radiac survey meters, (iii) sets of protective clothing, (iv) breathing units and (v) de-contamination units.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Officers of Gloucestershire and Gwent constabularies are trained in the effect of radioactivity during initial training with a refresher course every three years. Both forces have contingency plans for dealing with major incidents, including incidents involving radioactivity, which are exercised at least once a year. Gloucestershire police force holds 14 dosimeters and 338 radiac survey meters (PDRM82s), and Gwent 16 and 184 respectively. Further equipment and professional advice is available as set out in the Emergency Planning Guidance to Local Authorities. A copy is in the Library.

Neighbourhood Watch Schemes

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many neighbourhood watch schemes have been established (a) in Wales, (b) in South Wales, (c) in Cardiff and (d) in Cardiff, West; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There are currently 1,342 neighbourhood watch schemes in Wales. Of these, 463 are in the South Wales constabulary area including 54 in Cardiff of which 23 are in the police sub-division which covers the Cardiff, West constituency. We are encouraged by the involvement of the community in crime prevention indicated by the increase in the number of schemes in Wales during the last 12 months.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the percentage increase in burglaries in Cardiff to the last available figure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The figures collected centrally relate to police force areas and are published in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" (table 2.5 of the issue for 1985, Cmnd. 10). In the 12 months ending 30 September 1986 the South Wales police recorded 2 per cent. fewer offences of burglary than in the preceding 12 months.

National Emergencies (Safety)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he takes to ensure that local authorities provide for the safety of people in the event of a national emergency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Home Office issues the Emergency Planning Guidance to Local Authorities, a copy of which is in the Library, and ensures by means of monitoring that requirements within our area of responsibility are met.

Society for the Protection of Unborn Children

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis about the progress of the inquiry into the incident at the offices of the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children on Friday 15 February 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner that although the inquiry is still open, lack of evidence and problems over identification mean that there is little prospect of any prosecutions being brought.

Bilingual Penalty Tickets

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy of 16 January, Official Report, column 336, if he will list those practical difficulties involved in producing and using convenient bilingual versions of forms used under part III of the Transport Act 1982.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A substantial amount of information needs to be included in a fixed penalty notice for it to conform to the law, and the forms need to be produced in a format in which they can reasonably be carried by police officers in their tunic or shirt pocket. It would be difficult to produce bilingual forms which meet both these requirements.

Stop and Search

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the stop and search frequency and subsequent arrests and charging for September 1983, September 1984, September 1985 and September 1986 for the Highbury vale, Holloway, Upper street, City road and Kings Cross areas of Islington (N Division) of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [pursuant to his reply, 2 December 1986, c. 574]: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the readily available information is as given in the table. This revises some of the figures given in the Official Report at column 632 which I regret were incorrect. The table shows for 1982, 1983 and 1984 the number of persons or vehicles recorded as stopped; statistics showing the number of occasions on which a search was conducted are not available. Up to 1 April 1985, the information was collated on an annual basis and figures for the first quarter of 1985 could be provided only at disproportionate cost. From 1 April 1985, the Metropolitan police introduced a new code of practice relating to stop and search procedures and the information collected in line with sections 5 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, relates only to those occasions on which persons or vehicles were searched. The figures are therefore not comparable with those for earlier years. Monthly figures for such small areas are very variable, and have therefore been aggregated to provide quarterly totals. Figures for the third quarter are not available. Information on whether charges resulted from these arrests is not available.

Transport International Routier

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the countries that are signatories to the 1949 Transport International Routier; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I have been asked to reply.

The provisions of an international agreement signed at Geneva on 16 June 1949 relating to the international transport of goods by road were terminated on 1 January 1965.

A later customs convention on the international transport of goods by road (TIR carnets) signed at Geneva on 15 January 1959 was terminated and replaced by the present convention: the customs convention on the international transport of goods under cover of TIR carnets (TIR convention), signed at Geneva on 14 November 1975. The list of signatories (and accessions) to this convention (as at 31 December 1985) is as follows.

London (Homeless Persons)

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will, as a matter of urgency, in conjunction with the London boroughs of Lambeth, Southwark, Islington and Camden, make available the facilities of the civil defence bunkers at Clapham common, Clapham north, Clapham south and Stockwell underground stations for the immediate shelter of the homeless in inner city London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I have been asked to reply.

These facilities are the so-called deep tube shelters at Clapham Common, Clapham North, Clapham South and Stockwell. Those at Clapham South and Stockwell have been let commercially for storage purposes on long leases and are not therefore available. Those at Clapham North and Clapham Common are disused and are not in a fit state for habitation.

The Property Services Agency would be ready to consider an approach from a local housing authority, or other appropriate housing agency, regarding the feasibility of adaption and the possibility of leasing such facilities to them for such purposes.

However, the first priority must be to make the best use of local authority stock. In April 1986, 6,546 local authority dwellings in these four boroughs were empty; more than 2,132 had been empty for over a year.

Radiation

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on Government policy relating to the issue of potassium iodate tablets for use against iodine 131 resulting from a nuclear accident.

Mrs. Currie: I have been asked to reply.

Government plans in the event of a United Kingdom accident are outlined in the Health and Safety Executive booklet "Emergency Plans for Nuclear Installations". The plans provide for the issue of potassium iodate tablets for people within a distance of 2 to 3 kilometres downwind of the site of a release of radioactivity. Medical advice to the Government indicates that 200 mg of iodine is appropriate for use pending evacuation of those concerned. A further dose of 100 mg per day is advised if exposure continues because evacuation is thought unnecessary or inappropriate.

Electoral Areas

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list in the Official Report the 30 English non-metropolitan districts which have shown the greatest percentage reduction in electorate since 1981, giving the percentage and actual figure in each case.

Mrs. Currie: I have been asked to reply.

There are not 30 but 17 English non-metropolitan districts which showed a reduction in electorate between 1981 and 1986. They are as follows:

Non-metropolitan County District (ranked by percentage reduction)	Electorate		1981-86 reduction

WALES

Opencast Coal Mining

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the sites where planning permission has been granted for opencast coal mining in Wales, but which are pending authorisation for working by (a) British Coal and (b) private companies and the acreage of each site.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Authorisation under the Opencast Coal Act 1958 is required only in respect of British Coal sites. One such application for such authorisation in respect of a site for which planning permission has been granted is before my right hon. Friend for decision. This relates to 321·07 acres of land at Gilfach Iago, Ammanford, Dyfed.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will list the sites for which planning permission has been sought, but not yet decided upon, for opencast coal mining in Wales by (a) British Coal and (b) private companies and the acreage of each site;

(2) if he will list the sites for which planning permission has been granted for the development of opencast coal mining in Wales in each year since 1979 to (a) British Coal and (b) private companies and the acreage of each site.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the sites in Wales where opencast coal mines are being worked by (a) British Coal and (b) private companies and the acreage of each site.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: British Coal has provided the following information for its sites where coaling operations are in progress:

	Acres
Ashfield House Farm, Ewloe, Clwyd	41
East Pit, Gwauncaegurwen, West Glamorgan	713
Ffos Las, Trimsaran, Dyfed	1,045
Ffyndaff, Rhigos, Mid Glamorgan	750
Garnant, Garnant, Dyfed	284
Ley Farm, Chirk, Clwyd	85
Maesgwyn Further Extension, Banwen, West Glamorgan	[1]1,235
Nant Helen, Ystradgynlais, Powys and West Glamorgan	762
Park Slip Extension, Aberkenfig, Mid Glamorgan	[1]443

British Coal has also provided the following information for private sites for which licences under the Opencast Coal Act 1958 are still extant and where coaling operations are in progress:

	Acres
Pencoedcae, Rhymney, Gwent	4½
Pen Bryn Oer, Rhymney, Gwent (Consent originally given for a total area of 60 acres)	16
Cefn Uchaf, Glynneath, West Glamorgan	60
Cefn Rhigos, Rhigos, Mid Glamorgan	44
Gelliwarog, Ystradgynlais, Powys	7½
Caeharris, Dowlais, Mid Glamorgan (of a 35 acre land reclamation scheme)	25
Varteg Uchaf, Ystradgynlais, Powys	12
Blaenpergwm Colliery, Glynneath, West Glamorgan	23
Ginny Cottages, Llanhilleth, Gwent	3
Bryn Serth, Tredegar, Gwent (of an 88 acre land reclamation scheme)	13
Gilfach Goch, Ystradgynlais, Powys	5

[1] Includes partially restored areas.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the sites which have been licensed to be prospected for opencast coal in Wales by (a) British Coal and (b) private companies; and what is the acreage of each site.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: No licence is required by British Coal or private companies to carry out prospecting for opencast coal. Such operations are permitted by the general development order but there are stringent conditions which have to be observed.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many planning appeals concerning opencast coalmining have been heard by his Department since 1979, and how many were (a) appeals against refusals to grant permission in which the original decisions were overturned, (b) appeals against refusals to grant permission in which original decisions were upheld, (c) appeals against the granting of permission in which the original decisions were upheld, and (d) appeals against the granting of permission in which the original decisions were overturned.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Eleven such appeals have been determined since 1979. Six were allowed, overturning the original decision, and five were dismissed, upholding the original decision. There is no right of appeal to my right hon. Friend against the granting of permission by local planning authority.

Beef

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what effects he expects the further cuts in milk production quota to have on the Welsh beef industry.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The further cuts in milk quotas agreed by the Council of Agriculture Ministers in December could lead to an increase in dairy culling over the next two years. The Commission has however allocated 435 million ecu to meet the market management costs of dealing with extra beef during this period.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what measures have been taken by the Government to ensure a balanced beef market in the future for Welsh farmers and to shield producers from the effects in other sectors.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The retention of the beef variable premium scheme, the devaluation of the green pound, and the increase in the maximum possible rate of payment under the suckler cow premium scheme together will provide stability for the beef sector during the next two years as the balance between supply and demand improves. The next two years should see a substantial move towards lower intervention stocks and a more market-related level of production.

O and A-Levels

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has on how the percentage of entrants who succeed at A levels and O levels set by the Welsh Joint Education Committee compare with those who enter for examinations set by other boards.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information from the 1986 summer examinations, as supplied by the Welsh Joint Education Committee, is as follows:

	WJEC subject entries per cent.	Borrowed papers and project examinations[1] per cent.
'A' level[2]	73·2	66·4
'O' level[3]	58·1	58·2

[1] Examination papers, set by examination boards other than the WJEC, borrowed by the WJEC for candidates in Wales. These figures exclude entries made directly by some examination centres in Wales to examination boards other than the WJEC — information on which is not centrally available.

[2] Percentage of subject entries achieving grade E or above.

[3] Percentage of subject entries, excluding Common Syllabus entries, achieving grade C or above.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many entrants for O and A-level examinations in each year since 1979 in Welsh schools have sat Welsh Joint Education Committee papers; and how many have sat papers set by each of the English examination boards.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The available information on subject entries in the summer of each year, as supplied by the Welsh Joint Education Committee, is as follows:

	WJEC subject entries		Borrowed papers and project examinations[1]
	'O' level and Common Syllabus	'A' level	'O' level	'A' level
1979[2]	155,653	19,707	—	—
1980[2]	161,168	20,135	—	—
1981	168,908	21,282	2,444	862
1982	170,789	22,536	2,477	784
1983	174,640	23,635	2,645	829
1984	177,257	23,283	2,738	828
1985	174,652	23,142	2,947	796
1986	188,463	23,209	2,986	747

[1] Examination papers, set by examination boards other than the WJEC, borrowed by the WJEC for candidates in Wales. These figures exclude entries by some examination centres in Wales made directly to examination boards other than the WJEC — information on which is not centrally available.
[2] Separate figures for borrowed papers are not available; they are included under WJEC subject entries.

SCOTLAND

Development Department (Capital Expenditure)

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the planned levels of capital spending on roads, housing, water and sewerage in 1986-87, the likely outturn for 1986-87 and planned expenditure for 1987-88 by the Scottish Development Department and each of the regional authorities.

Mr. Ancram: Planned capital expenditure on transport, water and sewerage and housing for 1986-87 and 1987-88 is:

	1986-87 £ million	1987-88 £ million
Roads
Scottish Development Department	96	107
Local authorities	159	155
Water and sewerage	101	107
Housing	644	720

The information about roads expenditure by local authorities includes expenditure on other forms of transport infrastructure. The information about housing expenditure relates to expenditure by all agencies. The likely outturn for 1986-87 is expected to be closely in line with planned expenditure in all cases.

Decisions have not yet been taken about final capital allocations to regional authorities for 1987-88.

Housing

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list in the Official Report the numbers of houses below the tolerable standard in each of the housing authorities in Scotland;

(2) how many houses below the tolerable standard there are in (a) Shettleston constituency, (b) Glasgow district, (c) Strathclyde region and (d) Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: The number of houses below the tolerable standard reported to the Scottish Development Department at 31 March 1986 is set out in the table. Information is collected centrally only for the areas of District and Islands Councils.

Homelessness

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the numbers of homeless persons in (a) Shettleston constituency, (b) Glasgow district, (c) Strathclyde region and (d) Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: Estimates of the numbers of homeless persons are not available. The figures below show the numbers of households that applied under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 and were housed in temporary accommodation at 30 September 1986. BBC (Burglary)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the Strathclyde police report for him about the burglary at BBC Scotland, Queen Margaret drive, Glasgow, on 23 December 1986.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend has not received a report from Strathclyde police about this matter. I understand from the chief constable that the incident to which the hon. Member refers has not, in fact, been reported to the police.

Radiation

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to monitor the proportion of congenital malformations amongst babies born to women living in those parts of Scotland which were subject to rises in radiation levels following the nuclear accident at Chernobyl; and what plans he has to publish the information.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Peterhead Prison

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will indicate the number of prison officers employed at Peterhead prison and whether this is up to establishment.

Mr. Lang [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1987, c. 242]: The number of prison officer grade personnel employed at Peterhead prison at 1 January 1987 was 233 and the inmate population at 6 January 1987 was 172. In addition, eight civilian instructors and tradesmen were in posts for which prison officer grade staff with relevant qualifications were not available. The agreed complement of prison officer grades at Peterhead is 268, geared to an inmate population of 281.

Dundee

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the number and percentage of people employed in manufacturing services, construction and primary industries in each district ward in Dundee at the 1981 census; and what subsequent comparative information on such district wards he possesses.

Mr. Lang [pursuant to his reply, 19 January 1987, c. 397]: The tables give estimates derived from the 1981 census of population. Many of the figures have been estimated from small numbers in a 10 per cent. sample and are therefore subject to proportionately large sampling errors. For example, for an average ward, there is a roughly one in three chance that an estimate of 100 is in error by more than 30, and a roughly one in three chance that an estimate of 600 is in error by more than 60.

No more recent information is available.

TRANSPORT

East Coast Main Line

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the latest estimated cost of the east coast main line electrification project.

Mr. David Mitchell: The total authorised cost for the east coast main line electrification project, including new locomotives and rolling stock, is £314.5 million at 1983 prices, equivalent to some £360 million at 1986-87 prices.

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the projected completion date of the east coast main line electrification project.

Mr. David Mitchell: 1991.

A46-A47 Link Road

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport why he gave approval to the A46-A47 link road in east Leicester; what representations he received against the scheme; and if he will provide a breakdown by party.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to the reply, 14 January 1987, c. 193.]: The second paragraph of the above answer was misleading. The answer should read as follows.

The A46-A47 link road is the responsibility of Leicestershire county council, the highway authority. The scheme was accepted for transport supplementary grant in the 1985-86 financial year in recognition of its more than local traffic importance. The grant enables county councils to plan and finance major schemes. Acceptance for grant does not imply any views on the detailed aspects of any statutory orders which may still be necessary for the scheme.

The link road was included in the county structure plan approved in 1980. It was not affected by the alterations to the plan which are now passing through the statutory processes.

This Department does not have a record of all the objections that may have been made to the county council.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) whether SNCF anticipates customs inspectors on Channel tunnel trains travelling further than Ashford in pursuit of their duties;

(2) whether any Customs and Excise facilities will be operated at Ashford to handle (a) passenger and (b) freight traffic generated by the Channel tunnel.

Mr. Brooke: I have been asked to reply.

No decisions have been taken about on-train controls for passengers or freight carried on through services. French and United Kingdom Customs are holding discussions with SNCF and British Rail respectively about the controls for through trains. But it is likely that the United Kingdom customs controls would follow the familiar red-green arrangements for passengers terminating their journeys at Ashford or Waterloo and that facilities for shuttle train freight traffic would be provided at a purpose built clearance depot at Ashford.

Customs controls generally are to form part of a protocol to the Treaty at present under discussion covering all frontier controls.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Telephone Tapping

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Attorney-General whether any prosecutions have been brought under the Data Protection Act for unlawful tapping of telephone conversations by the means of misuse of telephone logging equipment.

The Attorney-General: No.

PRIME MINISTER

Privatisation

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Prime Minister (1) if she will list those Government-owned concerns or concerns owned by Government agencies or by wholly-Government-sponsored corporations or bodies, which were not limited companies, but which have become limited companies, although remaining in the same ownership, since 1979; and if she will state, in each case, how many of the employees, although still employed by the company, ceased to be civil servants;

(2) if she will list those private limited companies wholly or partly-owned by the Government or by Government agencies or by wholly Government-sponsored corporations or bodies.

The Prime Minister: The information in the form requested is not available. I refer the hon. Member to pages 27 and 28 of the supplementary statements to the Consolidated Fund and National Loans Fund accounts 1985-86 (HC 69), the various accounts laid before Parliament by public corporations or bodies, such as the nationalised industries, and paragraph 539 of the statement on the Defence Estimates 1985 (Cmnd. 9430-I).

Telephone Tapping

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Prime Minister whether her assurances of 10 December 1986, Official Report, column 161, with regard to the tapping of right hon. and hon. Members' telephones apply equally to right hon. and

hon. Members' conversations with persons whose telephones are being legally tapped; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to the reply that I gave on 10 December to my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Sir Alex Fletcher).

Diplomatic Immunity

Mr. Canavan asked the Prime Minister whether she will initiate action to stop abuse of diplomatic immunity by diplomats and members of their families particularly in cases involving criminal offences against children.

The Prime Minister: The Government and the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Commons both reviewed the Vienna convention on diplomatic relations and abuse of diplomatic immunities and privileges in 1984-85. The Government agreed (Cmnd. 9697) with the Committee's recommendation that they should apply the Vienna convention more firmly. That is now our policy. The diplomatic corps is well aware that in the absence of a waiver of immunity we require the immediate withdrawal of alleged serious offenders.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister, further to her written answer of 28 February 1985, Official Report, column 303, to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby concerning the cost of the common agricultural policy, whether she will publish in the Official Report figures showing by how much common agricultural policy expenditure has increased since 1984 compared to the increase in the European Economic Community's own resources base; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The financial guideline for agriculture first applied to expenditure in 1986. In that year the budget provision for expenditure, excluding that in Spain and Portugal, was 9·2 per cent. higher than in the base period used for the calculation of the guideline (the average of 1984 and 1985), compared with an 8·5 per cent. increase in the own resources base.

The Council agreed in July 1986, as provided for in the conclusions on budget discipline, that the 1986 reference framework including the agricultural guideline could be increased because of exceptional circumstances resulting from the decline in the United States dollar.

For 1987, the draft budget provides for agricultural guarantee expenditure to rise at a rate no higher than the increase in the own resources base (an increase compared with the base period of 13·4 per cent. excluding Spain and Portugal).

EMPLOYMENT

Restart Programme

Mr. Leighton asked the Paymaster General how many of the 2,000 additional staff recruited to administer the restart programme came from the ethnic minorities.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have introduced ethnic monitoring of staff recruited into my Department, but our information is not broken down on the basis of individual programmes. Of the new staff recruited to the employment and enterprise group of the Manpower Services Commission in the period May to Novembr 1986 figures so far available indicate that approximately 9 per cent. came from the ethnic minorities.

Pay Levels (Coventry)

Mr. Park asked the Paymaster General what information he has as to how many workers in the Coventry travel-to-work area now earn less than the Council of Europe's decency threshold.

Mr. Lee: Information on earnings is not available for individual travel-to-work areas.

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Paymaster General if factory inspectors appointed to the Health and Safety Executive are cleared for security purposes.

Mr. Trippier: Factory inspectors are cleared for security purposes to the extent necessary for carrying out their duties.

Job Training Scheme

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Paymaster General, pursuant to his answer of 19 January concerning the sample survey of the job training scheme pilots, how large the survey will be; if he will name the independent consultants involved; what precisely the survey will cover; and when he expects it to be completed.

Mr. Trippier: The survey of the new job training scheme pilots is being carried out by Research Bureau Limited. The survey includes interviews will all managing agents and most training and practical experience providers in the pilot areas, together with postal questionnaires to a sample of about two hundred trainees and a small number of people who have left the scheme or who were offered the option of joining but who did not take the offer.

The survey will provide a range of information on the characteristics of trainees, managing agents, training and experience providers, occupations in which training is given, and the qualifications sought, and the reasons why trainees and employers have participated in the scheme.

It is expected that the consultants will report the results of the survey in the spring.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Paymaster General if he will give a breakdown by month of (a) the numbers being accepted onto the enterprise allowance scheme since its inception and (b) the total number in receipt of the enterprise allowance for each month since its inception for (i) England and (ii) Wales.

Mr. Trippier: Separate figures for the numbers accepted onto the enterprise allowance scheme in England and Wales were not available until January 1985. Until this time they were calculated on a national basis.

Community Programme

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement about proposed reductions in community programme plans in 1987-88; and if he will provide a breakdown of the reductions as between the voluntary sector and the private sector for each of the Manpower Services Commission areas.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1987, c. 564-65]: The Manpower Services Commission plans to provide around 245,000 filled places within the community programme in 1987-88, creating opportunities for about 300,000 long-term unemployed people. The allocation of these places will be determined in the light of local circumstances in the normal way. Resources will continue to be focused on those areas most in need.

Departmental Achievement

Mr. Pawsey asked the Paymaster General if he will list the principal achievements of his Department since 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 813]: The effectiveness of our policies has been shown by the 1 million extra jobs created over the past three years and the many unemployed people helped by our employment and training measures.

Expenditure on employment and training measures has risen over the three years in question by more than 50 per cent. to a total of some £3 billion this year. The Action for Jobs campaign, launched in April 1986, is promoting greater awareness and increasing the effectiveness of the whole range of our employment and training measures.

Major developments in existing measures over the past three years include the expansion of work experience through the Community Programme and a refocusing of the Voluntary Projects Programme to help long-term unemployed people and those who wish to start their own businesses.

New initiatives launched since 1983 include the New Workers Scheme, to increase job opportunities for the 18 to 20-year-old age group, and the Restart programme, introduced nationally in July 1986, designed to help those who have been out of work for 12 months or more. We are inviting every long-term unemployed person to a personal interview which seeks to guide the individual to one of the opportunities available including submission to a job vacancy, entry to a job club, a place in the new Restart courses, entry to the Community Programme or help with self-employment on the Enterprise Allowance Scheme. In mid-December some 700,000 interviews had already been conducted. We are now piloting Restart for those unemployed over six months.

Through the City Action Teams and the eight task forces set up under the Inner City Initiative, my Department is also helping to improve the targeting of all Government programmes and resources in the most deprived inner city areas and assist the local communities to tackle the employment, environmental, and social problems more effectively. In addition, £8 million is being made available to help task forces to pilot experimental employment and enterprise related schemes to deal with inner city problems.

In September 1985, the Department took over responsibility for small firms and tourism. Our major priority has been to make information and advice more accessible to the self-employed and small businessmen by expanding facilities available through the small firms service, local enterprise agencies, the Manpower Services Commission, and jobcentres. In addition, to help establish a network of viable self-supporting enterprise agencies we have introduced a five-year local enterprise agencies grant scheme of financial assistance and £2·5 million in grants is being made available in the first year.

The enterprise allowance scheme which gives financial support and advice to people starting self-employment has been expanded in response to growing demand and now offers some 86,000 places a year. Over the past three years, the scheme has helped nearly 200,000 unemployed people to start up businesses, many of which have also created additional jobs for other workers.

The loan guarantee scheme has been improved and extended for five years. Since the scheme was launched in June 1981, nearly 17,300 companies have raised some £565 million with the help of the guarantee provided by the Government.

Eight regional enterprise units have been established in England to represent and promote the Department's interests in enterprise, small firms, deregulation and tourism at regional and local level.

Our strategy for vocational education and training was set out in the White Papers "Education and Training for Young People" (April 1985) and "Working together — Education and Training" (July 1986).

In 1983, we successfully launched the youth training scheme (YTS). Since then over 1 million young people have benefited, of whom more than two thirds moved into jobs, further education or training. We opened 175 information technology centres to train young people under YTS in computing and electronic assembly skills and 1986 saw a major development in YTS, which now provides two years' training for 16-year-olds and one year for 17-year-olds. YTS now gives young people the opportunity to work towards recognised vocational qualifications. The Government are currently investing about £1 billion annually in YTS and more than 300,000 trainees have already entered the new programme.

Our technical and vocational education initiative (TVEI) aims at financing the development of a more relevant and career-related curriculum in schools and will be developed into a national scheme from Autumn 1987 at a cost of £900 million over the next 10 years. In addition £25 million was made available over the period 1985 to 1987 for in-service training of teachers to promote developments particularly related to TVEI.

We have established the National Council for Vocational Qualifications covering England, Wales and Northern Ireland. It will ensure the implementation of a clear system of vocational qualifications, relevant to the world of industry and commerce, providing opportunities for progress into higher skills.

Important adult training developments which have taken place since 1983 include Open Tech, local collaborative projects, the job training scheme, career development loans and increased emphasis on training for enterprise. Our adult training strategy has been successful in influencing adult training and making it more relevant to labour market needs. Over 250,000 adults will be training during 1986-87, more than double the total in 1983-84.

The Government have taken steps to reduce the legal and administrative burdens on business. The White Paper "Lifting the Burden" (July 1985) set out a range of 80 measures designed to reduce burdens on business and a second White Paper "Building Business . . . Not Barriers" (May 1986) reported progress on the earlier proposals and put forward a series of new measures. It also gave details of the new administrative arrangements within Government for assessing the impact on business of proposals to introduce and alter regulations.

The Wages Act 1986 allows greater freedom and flexibility to employers in planning pay structures. In particular, by removing those under 21 from regulation it will help increase job opportunities for young people.

The Sex Discrimination Act 1986 removes restrictions on women's hours of work in industrial employment. The Act also extends the coverage of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 to firms with five or fewer employees and to partnerships of five or fewer (in respect of the partners themselves), narrows the exemption for private households and voids sex discrimination terms in collective agreements and employers' rules.

We have continued the step by step approach to industrial relations, designed to get a fair balance in collective bargaining and to make trade unions more accountable to their members. Among other measures the Trade Union Act 1984 requires the holding of secret ballots for election to union governing bodies and makes secret ballots a condition of trade unions' legal immunity for organising industrial action.

The unemployment benefit service has made good progress in improving its cost-effectiveness through better management practices including the development of an overall budgeting and operational planning system. The introduction of a new advanced computerised system which will be fully implemented by the end of 1987 will offer an improved service to claimants and achieve an 8 per cent. productivity improvement.

Major efforts are also being made to advise and guide claimants back into the labour market, to ensure that they remain available for work and to cut down on the level of fraud within the system.

My Department has continued to play a major part in the work of the European Community, particularly during the current United Kingdom presidency. The adoption of an action programme on employment growth based on an earlier proposal from the Governments of the United Kingdom, Italy and the Republic of Ireland, has for the first time established clear priorities for the Community's work in this area centred on support for small business, better training, more efficient labour markets and help for the long-term unemployed. We have also made major advances towards lightening burdens on business at European Community level with the agreement and implementation of the new procedures for assessing the compliance costs to business of new and existing European Community regulations in line with our own policies in the United Kingdom. Finally, we have continued to attract substantial support from the European Social Fund for employment and training programmes in the United Kingdom.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Anglo-Irish Agreement

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will place in the Library the text of the statement of the Northern Ireland police authority concerning the practice of asking members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary their views on the Anglo-Irish Agreement; whether it was with the authority of the Chief Constable that this practice was initiated; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: This is a matter for the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary. The Police Authority for Northern Ireland did not issue any statement on the matter.

Radiation

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to monitor the proportion of congenital malformations in infants born to women living in those parts of Northern Ireland which were subject to rises in radiation levels following the nuclear accident at Chernobyl; and what plans he has to publish the information.

Mr. Viggers: There are arrangements in Northern Ireland for monitoring congenital abnormalities which should identify any significant overall increase in such abnormalities following the Chernobyl accident, though it is unlikely to be possible to determine which abnormalities, if any, have an association with increases in radiation levels caused by this particular incident. Information on congenital abnormalities is published each year by the Department of Health and Social Services.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Set-aside Scheme

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of surplus cereal land he proposes to exclude from production in 1987 under his set-aside scheme.

Mr. Pike asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will now give details of the set-aside scheme he is proposing for surplus cereal land.

Mr. Gummer: I refer the hon. Members to the reply that I gave on Thursday 22 January to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell).

Intervention Stocks

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what was the level of butter stored in intervention on the latest available date in Norfolk; and what was the comparable figure on the same date in 1979, 1984 and 1985, respectively;

(2) what was the level of grain stored in intervention, and what were the storage points in Norfolk on 1 January or on the latest available date; and what was the comparable figure on the same date in 1979, 1984 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Gummer: The following stocks of intervention butter and grain were stored in Norfolk on 1 January 1987. The stocks at the beginning of 1984 and 1985 were given on 29 January 1986, Official Report, column 537. Records of storage locations in 1979 are no longer available.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the present extent of overhang of beet intervention stocks; how this compares with the situation at this time in 1986; and what are the prospects for 1987.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Animals (Exports)

Mr. Hardy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, following the recent transport of sheep to Spain in breach of his Department's conditions, he will prohibit the export of farm animals for slaughter.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list in the Official Report the initiatives currently being undertaken by his Department to assist manufacturing industry.

Mr. Butcher: My Department offers a wide range of measures to assist manufacturing industry. They are grouped under four headings:

(i) business and technical advisory services, under which support is given to allow firms to obtain advice on productivity, quality assurance, product design, biotechnology, the application of microelectronics and the use of integrated circuits;

(ii) innovation, under which selective financial support is given for research and development projects leading to new products and processes;

(iii) national and regional investment, under which support is given by way of assistance for selected major projects, for implementation studies and demonstration and investment projects relating to new technology, for quality assurance projects, regional assistance and regional development grants;

(iv) exports, under which firms are given information on overseas markets, help with entry into and the detailed requirements of overseas markets, and grants for major overseas projects.

Competition Policy

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he now expects to publish the conclusions of his review of competition policy.

Mr. Howard: I expect the work of the review of law and policy on mergers and restrictive trade practices to continue until the end of this year. Meanwhile, if changes of policy within the existing law are identified as desirable, the Government will not hesitate to implement them.

Films, Publishing and Copyright

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people are employed in his Department dealing with (a) commercial film making, (b) publishing and (c) copyright law.

Mr. Pattie: The numbers of staff dealing predominantly with (a) commercial film making, (b) publishing and (c) copyright law are four, two and eight, respectively.

Departmental Expenditure (Wales)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the total expenditure of his Department which is incurred in Wales for the current financial year and the most recent for which complete information is available.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 19 January 1987, c. 398]: Complete information on expenditure by my Department on a regional basis could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, we can say that in 1985-86 £3·7 million was spent in Wales under section 8 of the Industrial Development Act 1982 and over £1·9 million on support for innovation under the Science and Technology Act 1965. It is expected that similar amounts will be spent in 1986-87.

THE ARTS

Sherman Theatre, Cardiff

Mr. Terlezki asked the Minister for the Arts what representations have been made to him about the possible closure, through lack of funds, of the Sherman theatre in Cardiff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: No representations have been made to me about the theatre. The decision to withdraw grant has been taken by the University College, Cardiff.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Hong Kong

Sir Peter Blaker asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the Governments which have indicated that they will recognise the proposed Hong Kong British National (Overseas) passport as a valid travel document.

Mr. Renton: The following countries have indicated publicly that they will recognise passports endorsed with the national status of British National (Overseas): United States of America, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Switzerland and Spain. Of the many other Governments that we have approached over the BN(O) passport, a number have given us favourable preliminary reactions; none have stated that they will not recognise the new passport.

Soviet Union (Parcels Service)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to make representations to the Soviet Union to allow parcels to be sent from the United Kingdom to friends and relatives living in the Soviet Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The parcel post agreement of the Universal Postal Union to which the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom are signatories allows parcels to be sent from Britain to the Soviet Union. We continue to press the Soviet authorities to remove obstructions to the free passage of mail to the Soviet Union.

Vienna Conference

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the conference held in Vienna on East/West relations.

Mr. Renton: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) on 21 January.

Soviet Union (Visits)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he intends to visit the Soviet Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend has an invitation from the Soviet Foreign Minister to visit the Soviet Union this year. Dates have not yet been discussed.

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will consider making proposals to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics for multiple parliamentary visits of groups independent of IPU or conducted tours to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend has no present plans to make such proposals, which are for right hon. and hon. Members themselves. The Foreign Affairs Committee and a group of parliamentarians under IPU auspices have paid successful visits to the Soviet Union in the last two years. We consider parliamentary exchanges can play a useful role in increasing mutual understanding.

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he proposes to take any action in order to stimulate more effective exchange of visits by friends and relatives to and from the United Kingdom and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I raised the question of family visits and freer travel in my talks in Moscow last week. I impressed upon the Soviet authorities the need for a more flexible and humane approach in this area. We are also working at the Vienna CSCE meeting to reduce obstacles to travel.

Anglo-Soviet Relations

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current state of Anglo-Russian relations in the light of the Reykjavik meeting between President Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev.

Mr. Renton: Since the Reykjavik meeting we have continued to maintain an active dialogue with the Soviet Government on arms control, human rights, regional issues and other matters of mutual interest.

I discussed these matters in Moscow last week, stressing the need for progress on human rights.

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans Her Majesty's Government have to improve relations with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Renton: We are conducting an active dialogue with the Soviet authorities aiming to secure greater respect for human rights, progress in arms control, an increase in trade and contacts between people at all levels.

Soviet Union (Embassies)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the total number of Soviet personnel at present working at the Russian embassy in London; how many British personnel are employed at the Russian embassy in London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The total number of Soviet personnel at present working at the Soviet embassy in London is 72. We are not aware of any British staff working at the embassy.

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the total number of British personnel in the British embassy in Moscow; how many Russian personnel are employed at the embassy in Moscow; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: There are currently 74 British and 72 Soviet personnel employed at the British embassy in Moscow.

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the latest development in the reallocation of a site and building of a new British embassy in Moscow; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Negotiations with the Soviet Government over the reciprocal provision of embassy sites in London and Moscow have taken place, intermittently, over many years. In May 1986, the two sides initialled the text of a sites exchange agreement under which there would be a (cost free) exchange of two sites in Moscow for two sites in London. Our objective is to sign this agreement soon, but the Soviet side has not yet been willing to proceed to signature.

Helsinki Agreement

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the response by the Soviet Union to the Helsinki agreement at the Vienna conference to date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The United Kingdom delegation to the Vienna CSCE follow-up meeting raised the issue of Soviet compliance with its CSCE commitments on many occasions during the first phase of the meeting. Despite a small number of promising signs their overall response has been unsatisfactory. Many questions posed by our delegation to their Soviet counterparts remain unanswered. We hope for a more serious response in the forthcoming phase of the meeting.

Drugs

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he intends to take against those countries from which drugs are being exported to the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Drug production, trafficking and misuse are a real or potential threat to all countries, whether producer, transit or consumer. No one country can hope to defeat the problem alone; a key element of our strategy is therefore to encourage and support international action against the drug traffickers, whatever their nationality. We urge all Governments to take all possible steps to prevent the export of drugs and to co-operate in the international effort to curb illicit drug production and misuse.

EC (Trade with Soviet Union)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made as to how the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics has benefited through increased trade with the European Community in agriculture, industrial equipment and military equipment, since the early 1950s; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Soviet imports from the EC have grown substantially since the 1950s but they remain relatively small in terms of total Soviet trade. In agriculture, purchases of meat, dairy products and grain from the EC and elsewhere have done something to improve the diet of the Soviet people which Soviet agriculture has itself largely been unable to do. The contribution of imports from the EC to Soviet industry has been of importance in some fields, notably natural gas, chemicals and automobiles. EC states have effectively refrained from exporting military equipment to the USSR through their application of export controls on strategic goods and technologies.

Soviet Union (Human Rights)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to secure the publication of the report by the International Human Rights Committee about human rights in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The second periodic report submitted by the Soviet Union to the Human Rights Committee was published by the United Nations as UN document CC PR/C/8/ADD3. This report was discussed by the Human Rights Committee during its 23rd session in October 1984 and a summary of these discussions is contained in the committee's report to the 40th session of the United Nations General Assembly, published on 19 September 1985 as UN document A/40/40.

Soviet Union (British Students)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British students are currently studying in Kiev; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: We are not aware of any British students currently studying in Kiev.

Republic of Ireland (Agreements)

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 19 January, what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the continuation in force of the 1925 boundary agreement and the Ireland (Confirmation of Agreement) Act 1925; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Our policy is that both the 1925 boundary agreement and the Ireland (Confirmation of Agreement) Act 1925 should remain in force.

ENVIRONMENT

Deep Mining

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what research has been undertaken by his Department into the effects of deep mining on the water table and the subsequent effect on trees.

Mr. Tracey: None.

Houses in Multiple Occupation

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the second report of his Department's research into houses in multiple occupation will be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The report is being published today. Copies have been placed in the Library and are being sent to local authorities and others concerned. We shall be consulting them on various detailed matters arising from the report.

The report indicates that houses in multiple occupation do a useful job in many towns and cities. They provide relatively cheap furnished accommodation and a lack of restriction which is popular with some tenants. But standards in the sample of 550 HMOs surveyed for our research were often very low. Some needed major repairs, others lacked amenities. Many needed improvements in their fire escape arrangements.

Local authorities already have duties and extensive powers to take action to improve standards in appropriate cases. But the research suggests that practice is patchy. We have already issued advice to local authorities on their powers following the consolidation of the Housing Acts. We now propose to back this up with further advice and assistance. We shall be recruiting an environmental health officer to advise the Department and to help prepare and publicise examples of good practice. We are asking authorities to include HMOs in the priority categories where grants should be concentrated. We also plan to issue leaflets for HMO landlords and residents to improve their knowledge of their respective rights and of the availability of grant.

Building Research Establishment

Mr. Ward asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement following his consideration of the study of the Building Research Establishment by Sir Henry Chilver and Sir Peter Harrop.

Mr. Ridley: I welcome the recommendations made by this study, which provides a clear basis for the future of the Building Research Establishment within my Department. A copy of the study report has been placed in the House of Commons Library today and copies are being sent to those who contributed to the study.

Among its major recommendations the report contains proposals on BRE's primary role, on the basis for its work for the Department of the Environment, on its relationship with the construction industry and on the planning of Government research requirements:

> The report recommends that BRE's primary role should be to act as contractor for Government, working on health and safety in buildings, the performance of buildings, standards and codes of practice on construction and the pursuit of national policies on the construction and use of buildings.
> It also recommends that a DOE Steering Committee should be set up representing Government Departments, BRE and BRE visitors to agree a medium term research plan, settle targets, objectives and priorities and watch over performance.
> BRE should be allowed to undertake more work commissioned by and paid for by private industry, accounting for at least 10 per cent. but not more than 15 per cent. of total effort.
> Government research conducted as part of its sponsorship of the construction industry should be more concerned than at present with fostering competitiveness and less with performance standards and research of this kind should be carried out mainly through research associations on a cost-sharing basis with industry.

Discussions are now beginning on the implementation of the recommendations including both management and the trade unions involved.

Shorthold Tenancies

Mr. Raynsford asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the total number of protected shorthold tenancies which (a) have been created and (b) remain in letting in each of the years from 1981 to 1986 in (i) Greater London and (ii) the rest of England and Wales.

Mr. Tracey: This information is not available. Over 5,000 protected shorthold tenancies were created in England and Wales in 1981, the first year after shorthold was introduced, and the only year for which figures are available. Information about shortholds created since 1 December 1981 has not been collected because the compulsory rent registration requirement for new shortholds outside the greater London area was lifted on that date.

Water Legislation

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, further to his reply to the hon. Member for Copeland, (Dr. Cunningham) Official Report, 18 December 1986, columns 685-86, if he will list the names of individuals and companies which received fees in 1985-86 and 1986-87; what fees each received; and, in each case, what services were provided.

Mr. John Patten: I will answer this question shortly.

Nitrates

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, further to his reply to the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington, Official Report, 18 December 1986, column 685, what progress has been made regarding consultations with farming interests; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Discussions are being held with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on the contribution which may be made by farming interests towards the reduction of nitrate levels in water. In addition officials have met representatives of the fertiliser industry, water authorities are being encouraged to meet local farmers, and I will be discussing the subject with the National Farmers Union at an early date.

Water Shortage

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his Department's response to the present problems in London and other areas regarding water shortages and water mains bursts.

Mr. John Patten: Water supply difficulties have arisen recently because pipes have burst due to frost action and water is running to waste. Water undertakers are repairing their own mains quickly but most water is being lost through bursts in consumers' plumbing systems. It is therefore most important that consumers should economise with water use and those who suffer a burst should turn off their water supply at the stop-cock and get their pipes repaired. All water undertakers are at present in general able to provide water to meet this extra demand on their supply systems which in some places exceeds the peak demand of a hot summer. The position in London is delicately balanced. The Thames Water Authority is manipulating its system to meet ever-changing conditions and have had to make emergency supplies available in some places including to hospitals. I am monitoring the situation closely and wish to thank water authorities, water companies and their staff for their efforts to maintain water supplies during very difficult conditions.

National Water Grid

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy on a national water grid; and what action his Department is taking towards the creation of such a grid.

Mr. John Patten: I will answer this question shortly.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people are employed in his Department dealing with (a) public libraries, (b) heritage arts and (c) historic buildings.

Mr. Ridley: I will answer this question shortly.

Housing (Right to Buy)

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish details of the right-to-buy awareness study which his Department has arranged for the Central Office of Information to commission, including cost, sample sizes and the research company involved.

Mr. John Patten: The Central Office of Information has commissioned on the Department's behalf a small-scale survey of the extent to which council tenants are aware of their right to buy, to help assess the effectiveness of measures to inform tenants of the changes in the Housing and Planning Act 1986. The study is being undertaken by Mark Research Limited; a sample of some 1,000 tenants in randomly selected areas will be approached; and the estimated cost is £40,000.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Military Equipment

Mr. Cabora asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if extra measures are being taken by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise officials to ensure that Britain is not used as a centre for the illegal supply of military equipment to South Africa or Iran.

Mr. Brooke: No, long-standing Customs controls are adequate to meet the perceived risks.

Capital Taxes Office

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the backlog of work at the capital taxes office; and if he will take on extra staff to deal with it.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Current arrears of work at the capital taxes Office vary between different parts of the office from around two to four weeks input. Additional staff have been recruited and these should be able to reduce the arrears after the necessary training. Work will be reduced by the abolition last year of the immediate tax charge on certain lifetime transfers.

Domestic Output

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the annual percentage change in total output each year since 1970 using the output measure of gross domestic product at constant factor cost; and what has been the annual percentage change in the total excluding the extraction of oil and gas.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is as follows:

Agriculture

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his answer of 15 March 1985, Official Report, column 310, to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby concerning value added in agriculture, whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the value added figures for the United Kingdom for the years since 1982 and his forecast for 1987, together with (a) the estimated United Kingdom contribution to the EEC budget each year and (b) the total amount spent in the United Kingdom out of public funds on agriculture and agricultural support, including administrative overheads.

Mr. Brooke: The information requested is contained in the following table. The table gives figures for value-added in agriculture, the United Kingdom contribution to the EEC budget and the amount of public support to agriculture. The data is given only up to 1985 since data for 1986 is not yet available. The Government do not make forecasts for GDP in agriculture.

(2) The figures for the United Kingdom contribution to the EEC budget are the total net payments to European Community institutions (excluding overseas aid).

(4) Figures in columns b and (c) refer to financial years so that under the heading 1982 is given expenditure for financial year 1982-83, etc.

Taxation

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will detail the proportions of pre and post-tax increases, including national insurance contributions, paid to the top 1 per cent., 2 per cent., 3 per cent., 4 per cent., 5 per cent., 10 per cent., 20 per cent., 30 per cent., 50 per cent., and 75 per cent. of taxpayers in 1978-79 and the latest available year; and what this represents in money terms.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the cost of issuing an income tax return form for every taxpayer every year.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 19 January 1987, c. 412-13]: About £9 million a year, once PAYE is fully computerised, for all employed and self-employed people known to the Revenue. The additional cost of examining these returns would depend on the amount of follow-up work to be done, but it would be considerable.

Interest Rates

Mr. Dubs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current prevailing rate of United Kingdom interest; and what information he has on comparable rates in the United States of America, West Germany, France and Japan, respectively.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Three-month interbank rates in London are around 11 per cent. As in other main OECD countries, interest rates in the United Kingdom are kept at the level necessary to maintain appropriate monetary conditions.

Government Departments (Union Representatives)

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest estimates of the numbers of elected union representatives employed in each of the main Government Departments and of the cost of providing paid time off.

Mr. Brooke: The estimates as at 1 June 1986 are shown in the following tables. Compared with the position as at 1 June 1985, the total amount of paid time off for union business shows a reduction of 18 man years (1·5 per cent.) with a consequential saving (in real terms) of £0·13 million reflecting for the fourth year the tighter control and accountability measures introduced by the revised national facilities agreement in 1982.

Banking Services

Sir Peter Hordern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will review matters relating to the law affecting banking services.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his answer, 14 November 1986, c. 8-9]: I am pleased to announce that Professor Robert Jack of Glasgow university (a senior partner of McGrigor Donald, solicitors, Glasgow) has indicated his willingness to chair the committee to review banking services law. Mr. Geoffrey Taylor (retiring vice-chairman of Midland Bank plc) and Mrs. Liliana Archibald (a director of the Fenchurch Group) have expressed their willingness to serve as the other two members of the committee. I look forward to the review committee beginning its work very shortly.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) whether SNCF anticipates customs inspectors on Channel tunnel trains travelling further than Ashford in pursuit of their duties;

(2) whether any Customs and Excise facilities will be operated at Ashford to handle (a) passenger and (b) freight traffic generated by the Channel tunnel;

(3) whether French customs and excise officials will undertake on-train customs inspection for (a) passengers and (b) freight using the Channel fixed link; and whether they will travel further than Ashford.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 20 January 1987, c. 469]: No decisions have been taken about on-train controls for passengers or freight carried on through services. French and United Kingdom Customs are holding discussions with SNCF and British Rail respectively about the controls for through trains. But it is likely that the United Kingdom customs controls would follow the familiar red-green arrangements for passengers terminating their journeys at Ashford or Waterloo and that facilities for shuttle train freight traffic would be provided at a purpose built clearance depot at Ashford.

Customs controls generally are to form part of a protocol to the Treaty at present under discussion covering all frontier controls.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Hospitals

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he plans to discuss smoke-free environments in long-stay hospitals at regional review meetings.

Mrs. Currie: Policies regarding smoking on National Health Service premises may be discussed during consideration of disease prevention and health promotion which can be raised as an agenda item at regional review meetings.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the total number of beds in each regional health authority area in England for each year since 1979.

Mrs. Currie: The available information is given in the table. The total number of in-patient cases rose by 953,692 (17·7 per cent.) from 5,400,120 in 1979 to 6,353,812 in 1985 and the number of in-patient cases treated per bed increased by 31 per cent. from 14·9 to 19·5.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the answer of 19 January, Official Report, columns 427-28, to the hon. Member for Oldham, West on the hospital beds breakdown for 1985, what were the figures for the same regions and specialties in 1979, and what has been the percentage change in each case from 1979 to 1985.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 22 January 1987]: The information requested is given in the table. Between 1979 and 1985 the total number of in-patient cases rose by 17·7 per cent. from 5,400,120 to 6,353,812 and the number of in-patient cases treated per bed increased by 31 per cent. from 14·9 to 19·5.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many hospitals in each region are now refusing all but emergency admissions; and what percentage of hospitals this is in each region.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 21 January 1987]: During the recent bad weather the vast majority of hospitals all over the country have been able to continue to admit patients from their waiting lists, although problems of transport for patients and staff, and in some cases supplies, meant that less non-urgent work was done than normal. The prime exception was Kent where the intensity of the snowfall led to five out of six districts having to restrict their work to emergencies and urgent cases such as rediotherapy.

Babies (Congenital Malformations)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to monitor the proportion of congenital malformations amongst babies born to women living in those parts of England and Wales which were subject to rises in radiation levels following the nuclear accident in Chernobyl; and what plans he has to publish the information.

Mrs. Currie: The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys already operates a scheme for monitoring congenital malformations at district health authority level for a large selection of different malformations in England and Wales. This is collected on a monthly basis and any significant increase in the incidence of malformations would be detected. Details of notified congenital malformations are summarised and published annually in an OPCS Monitor in the MB3 series.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what rate of benefit will be paid to those long-term unemployed persons who accepted a place on the new job training scheme and who are still unemployed at the end of their training course; and if the same rate will be paid to a claimant who leaves before completeing six months under the scheme.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. and learned Friend, the Paymaster General to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South West (Mrs. Bottomley) on 16 January 1987, at columns 334-35.

The rate of benefit an individual will receive as a result of these new arrangements will depend on his or her circumstances at the time. Subject to any other changes of circumstances, trainees will receive the same income by way of training allowance and supplementary benefit while on the course as they received previously in benefit alone. Those who do not find work after training and whose circumstances are unchanged will normally get the same rate of benefit that they received before they began the course. Trainees who leave the scheme early will similarly receive the same rate of benefit as was paid before the course.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people receiving supplementary pension have had their gas bills paid directly by his Department for each of the last three years ended on 31 March.

Mr. Major: The information is as follows:

	Numbers
1982	4,000
1983	3,000
1984	5,000

The source of these figures is the annual statistical inquiry. The information relates to the number for whom these arrangements applied in December of each year and is the most recent available.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people receiving supplementary pension have had their electricity bills paid directly by his Department for each of the last three years ended on 31 March.

Mr. Major: The information is as follows:

	Numbers
1982	6,000
1983	4,000
1984	5,000

The source of these figures is the annual statistical inquiry. The information relates to the number for whom these arrangements applied in December of each year and is the most recent available.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people receiving supplementary benefit have had either their gas or electricity bills paid directly by his Department for each of the last three years ended on 31 March.

Mr. Major: The information is as follows:

	1982	1983	1984
Electricity	120,000	140,000	150,000
Gas	69,000	92,000	111,000

The source of these figures is the annual statistical inquiry. The information relates to the numbers for whom these arrangements applied in December each year and is the most recent available. Some people will have had both their electricity and gas paid direct and will therefore be included in both sets of figures.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if there has been any change of policy in the last three years with regard to those receiving supplementary benefit or pension in respect of direct payment of gas and electricity bills or rent arrears; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: Policy relating to the direct payment of gas and electricity for those receiving supplementary benefit is agreed by the industries concerned and the Department in the form of a joint statement of intent. This agreement has not been changed since 1982. There have been no policy changes in the arrangements for direct payment of rent arrears since the housing benefit scheme was introduced in 1982-83.

Mr. S. Grainger

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Social Services for what information, which was not available at the time, he was waiting in order to respond to the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate's letter of 15 September 1986 concerning his constituent Mr. S. Grainger which delayed his response until 19 January 1987.

Mr. Lyell: The delay in replying to my hon. Friend's letter was not caused by the need to obtain further information. Essential work on the reform of social security has meant that I have not been always able to reply to hon. Members' letters as quickly as I should have liked. I apologise to my hon. Friend for the delay in this particular case.

Social Fund

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in the light of lack of legal cover for valid replacement of the current maternity and death grants, he will now withdraw the regulations covering the social fund.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to the statement that I made to the House yesterday.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services for how many weeks running from Monday to Sunday in each of the last seven years each of the 64 weather station areas recorded a 0°C temperature.

Mr. Major: There are 63 designated weather stations which provide data for the exceptionally cold weather payments scheme. The information requested for each of these appears in the following table:

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he will estimate the additional annual cost of extending the qualifying categories for severe weather payments to include all pensioners who are currently in receipt of any financial support from the housing benefit scheme;

(2) whether he will estimate the additional annual cost of raising the trigger temperature of severe weather payments from minus 1·5 degrees Celsius to zero degrees Celsius;

(3) whether he will estimate the cost of dispensing with the capital limit of £500 and paying severe weather payments to all pensioners in receipt of either supplementary pensions or payment of any housing benefit;

(4) whether he will estimate the cost of paying severe weather payments to all supplementary pensioners without the present application for heating having to be completed.

Mr. Major: It is not possible to make a reliable estimate of the annual cost of amending the scheme since actual costs will depend on the number of weather stations at which, and for how many weeks, the qualifying temperature is reached in any particular year.

If the scheme were amended to include all pensioners in receipt of standard or certificated housing benefit, with no £500 capital limit, the number in the qualifying groups would increase from approximately 1½ million to approximately 4½ million. This figure includes supplementary pensioner householders with capital in excess of £500.

Residential Homes

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was paid by his Department to private nursing homes and residential homes as board and lodging allowances for residents in these homes in (a) 1979 and (b) 1984.

Mr. Major: People in private and voluntary residential care and nursing homes can claim supplementary benefit to help meet the fees. The amount of supplementary benefit paid to people in all of these homes in 1979 was £10 million and in 1984 £200 million. Separate information on the amount of benefit paid to people in private homes alone is not available.

Sex Equality

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to lay the regulations amending the Social Security (Hospital In-Patients) Regulations 1975 to provide for the equal treatment of men and women.

Mr. Major: I have today laid the Social Security (Hospital In-Patients) Amendment Regulations 1987 which come into effect on Friday 13 February and ensure that men and women are treated equally under the rules governing the adjustment of benefits for those undergoing treatment as hospital in-patients. These amended rules fulfil the terms of European Community Directive 79/7 EEC and we expect to be able to identify and pay arrears to virtually all those married women and some men who experienced a reduction of retirement pension, invalidity benefit or severe disablement allowance in the period since 22 December 1984 when the Directive took effect.

As part of our programme for the review and simplification of the benefits system we shall shortly be putting to the Social Security Advisory Committee proposals for changes in the existing rules on the adjustment of benefits in payment to hospital in-patients which in their present form are complex and difficult to administer.

Midwives

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many midwives are currently employed in each district health authority area, and how far short this is of full establishment in each area.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 10 December 1986, c. 217]: The number of midwives (including midwifery students) in whole-time equivalent terms employed in each district health authority at 30 September 1985 (the latest date for which such detail is available) is given in the table.

Information on establishments is not collected centrally. However, I am aware of the results of a survey of a sample of health authorities in England conducted for the review body for nursing staff, midwifery and health visitors which showed that at 31 March 1985 only about 3 per cent. of whole-time equivalent funded posts for qualified midwives remained vacant for over three months, compared with the average of 2·5 per cent. for all nursing and midwifery staff.

Midwifery staff (excluding agency staff) in post at 30 September 1985—Whole time equivalents

(3) District figures do not include staff in London Post-Graduate Special Health Authorities.

Hillingdon Health Authority

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing the extent to which the funding of Hillingdon health authority has changed in real terms between 1982-83 and 1986-87, taking account of (i) changes in demography, (ii) medical technology and (iii) the effects of national and regional reallocation processes.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 18 December 1986, c. 708]: Between 1982-83 and 1985-86* revenue expenditure by Hillingdon health authority increased by 2·6 per cent. in real terms, as measured by the gross domestic product deflator. I regret that information is not available on the costs of demographic change and advances in medical technology at district level.

* Figures for 1986-87 not available.

Private Patients

Mr. John Browne asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish for each health authority in England the number of cases and the average length of stay for each of private patients and National Health Service patients for each specialty covered by National Health Service statistical returns.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 10 December 1986, c. 209]: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. Friend all the information he seeks. Information at district level can be obtained only at disproportionate cost and the numbers in the central data sample are too small for reliable estimates to be made for private patients in most specialties at regional level. The available information is given in the following table:

NHS (Property Sales)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all surplus National Health Service property sold since 1979 in excess of £50,000, the price obtained and the date of sale.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 12 January 1987, c. 123]: The information requested is set out in the following table. It is taken from returns sent to the Department by regional health authorities at the end of each financial year and does not include transactions of under 1 acre. All proceeds from disposals are retained by health authorities and used for reinvestment in the service.

Artificial Limbs

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many limbs were fitted at artificial limb and appliance centres in each month since January 1985.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1987]: The information requested is not available centrally. However, the number of patient attendances for "fittings" in each four-week period since January 1985 is shown in the table.

Fittings at all Artificial Limb and Appliances Centres by all Contractors January 1985-December 1986

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the progress made towards implementing each of the recommendations of the McColl report.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1987]: We have reported progress on developing and improving the Artificial Limb and Appliance Centre services since the McColl report was published, and shall continue to do so. We are still considering some of the major issues raised in the report, and we will announce decisions as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many prosthetist appointments at artificial limb and appliance centres have been postponed due to the failure to supply limbs in time because of the Hanger's dispute.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1987]: Since the J.E. Hanger industrial dispute began on 16 September 1986, 111 prosthetist appointments have had to be postponed as a result of the failure of the company to supply repaired or new prostheses in time.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the organisations and individuals whose reaction to the McColl report has been obtained during the consultation period; and what are the main conclusions he draws from that consultation.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1987]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the right hon. Member for Stoke on Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) on 12 January 1987, at columns 109-110.

Additionally, in commenting on the artificial limb service, patients' and professional interests have generally welcomed the report's conclusions, but the artificial limb industry has argued that it paints too bleak a picture. I gave a detailed account of the position on the artificial limb service during the debate in the House on 26 November, at columns 330-32. Most of those commenting on the wheelchair service have supported the introduction of a powered indoor-outdoor chair, but do not agree that this should be funded by abatement of mobility allowance. We are still considering this major issue in the context of decisions on other important aspects of the ALAC services raised by the McColl report.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the McColl review of artificial limb and appliance centre services was completed; when he first received the report; and why the report was not published until 27 January 1986.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1987]: The review of Artificial Limb and Appliance Centre services was completed in autumn 1985, and the working party's report was received on 14 October of that year. However, following its submission, Professor McColl and his colleagues decided to make a number of amendments which had to be incorporated before publication. Their final revisions were submitted on 8 January 1986. None affected a point of substance or any of the working party's conclusions or recommendations.

Social Workers

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what arrangements are being made for approval of social workers under the Mental Health Act 1983, following the expiry of the arrangements to give transitional approval to certain social workers; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will make a statement on his Department's discussions with local authority associations, the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work and the National and Local Government Officers Association about the current Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work proposals for new training courses for social workers; what issues are still outstanding; and when he expects the full implementation of longer term arrangements for approved social workers under the Mental Health Act 1983.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 22 January 1987]: Discussions took place with the local authority associations the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work and the National and Local Government Officers Association last year and culminated in an agreement on arrangements for approving social workers under the Mental Health Act 1983. Local authorities were notified of the agreement in November 1986 (local authority circular (86)15).

The new arrangements will take time to implement fully and the transitional arrangements will continue until 27 October 1988. For the future, social workers who are to be considered for approval will, among other things, be required to complete a training course approved by CCETSW. Regulations and guidance on the approval of courses will be issued by CCETSW in the near future.

The only issue outstanding is the question of resources. Officials have discussed with CCETSW their likely costs for the exercise and we are now considering the position. We have also agreed with the local authority associations to consider jointly with them the extra costs that will be incurred by authorities in training social workers for these duties.

Adolescents (Hospital Care)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has received a copy of the report of the British Paediatric Association working party on the needs and care of adolescents; and what plans and policies he has for the in-patient hospital care of adolescents.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 22 January 1987]: The British Paediatric Association provided a copy of this report to the Department and to regional medical officers. We have no plans at this stage to issue further advice to health authorities.

DEFENCE

"Secret Society"

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence by what means he first obtained knowledge of the content of Duncan Campbell's film for BBC Scotland, the "Secret Society".

Mr. Younger: I will answer shortly.

Military Convoys

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he intends to take to prevent those protesting at military convoys from causing injury to others lawfully assisting such convoys.

Mr. Stanley: The policing of military convoys is a matter for the civil police. The safety of all those present is always a major consideration.

Resource Allocations

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Defence if any recent change in his Department's appraisal of the military threat to the United Kingdom has led to a reallocation of resources within the defence budget.

Mr. Stanley: Not to any material extent.

British Army of the Rhine

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to strengthen the British Army of the Rhine.

Mr. Stanley: On present plans we intend to increase the size of BAOR to 56,000 by the end of the decade. Together with plans to transfer manpower from the support area to the front line, this will permit the formation of a twelfth in-theatre armoured regiment and a third air defence regiment equipped with the Starstreak missile; the remechanisation of 6 Airmobile Brigade; the introduction of the Phoenix remotely piloted vehicle; and an increase in armoured engineer support to battlegroups.

In addition to the introduction of Starstreak and Phoenix we also plan to strengthen BAOR through the provision of additional Challenger tanks, the Warrior mechanised infantry combat vehicle, the multiple launch rocket system, and the Rapier 2000 air defence missile.

Royal Ordnance Factories

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Defence what consultation he proposes to hold in connection with obligations under the Trade Unions of Public Employees 81 agreement with the relevant trade unions prior to finalising any sale of the Royal Ordnance factories.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The transfer of ownership by sale of the Government's 100 per cent. shareholding in Royal Ordnance plc would not involve any change in the legal identity of the owner of the business and employer of the work force and so would not affect the terms and conditions of service of employees. In these circumstances, the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) 1981 regulations do not apply. However, my right hon. Friend recognises the importance of keeping the work force informed of developments and is ready to meet the relevant trade unions and hear their views before finalising any sale.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations have taken place between his Department and the work force of the Royal Ordnance factories concerning plans for their privatisation.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The change of status and privatisation of the Royal Ordnance factories were discussed extensively with the work force at the time of the passage of the Ordnance Factories and Military Services Act 1984. Since then, there has been correspondence and a number of meetings with representatives of the work force. Royal Ordnance plc has also taken care to keep the work force informed on progress towards privatisation. On the current position I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave today to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike).

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement of the progress of the Government's plans for the privatisation of the Royal Ordnance factories.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In accordance with plans announced to the House of Commons by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 24 July 1986, the Ministry of Defence is negotiating with four companies to sell the Government's 100 per cent. shareholding in Royal Ordnance plc. The four companies are currently conducting detailed reviews of Royal Ordnance, including visits to various factories. Final selection of the company with which a sale contract will be signed will not be for some time yet.

DROPS

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) on what authority General Stopford was asked to ascertain directly from Mr. Trafford Broughton his attitude to the BBC Panorama programme on the DROPS contract;

(2) on what dates General Stopford sought to ascertain directly from Mr. Trafford Broughton his attitude to the DROPS contract;

(3) what was the source of his information that Mr. Trafford Broughton's conversation with General Stopford accorded exactly with the line volunteered on a separate occasion at the British Army equipment exhibition to the Chief of Defence Procurement and Brigadier Last;

(4) whether he will publish in the Official Report a report of the conversation between Mr. Trafford Broughton, the Chief of Defence Procurement and Brigadier Last at the British Army equipment exhibition;

(5) on what authority Brigadier Last and the Chief of Defence Procurement sought at the British Army equipment exhibition to ascertain Mr. Trafford Broughton's attitude to the Panorama programme on the DROPS contract.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I will answer shortly.

United Kingdom Mobile Force

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he has anything to add to the statement made by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement, the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell, to the House on 13 January, Official Report, column 232, on the nature of the United Kingdom mobile force;

(2) if he will make a further statement on the future of the United Kingdom mobile force commitment to Denmark and Schleswig-Holstein;

(3) whether discussions have taken place recently with politicians, officials, or military personnel from Denmark on any proposed changes to the United Kingdom mobile force commitment to that country;

(4) whether discussions have taken place with General Bernard Rogers, Supreme Commander, Allied Forces, Europe, on the future of the United Kingdom mobile force commitment to Denmark and Schleswig-Holstein;

(5) whether discussions have taken place recently with any North Atlantic Treaty Organisation personnel on changes to the United Kingdom mobile force commitment to Denmark and Schleswig-Holstein;

(6) whether discussions have taken place recently with politicians, officials, or military personnel from the Federal Republic of Germany on any changes to the United Kingdom mobile force commitment to Denmark and Schleswig-Holstein;

(7) whether discussions have taken place recently with politicians, officials or military personnel from the United States of America on any proposed changes to the United Kingdom mobile force commitment to Denmark and Schleswig-Holstein.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces to the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) on 20 January. Naturally all interested Allies are being kept informed of our discussions within NATO and, in view of the strategic importance of the Baltic approaches, any proposals for change would be a matter for collective Alliance consideration.

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of cost savings by withdrawing the United Kingdom's mobile force commitment to Denmark and Schleswig-Holstein.

Mr. Freeman: Her Majesty's Government are committed to making efforts to improve output from the considerable resources we devote to defence and it is in this context that we are discussing within NATO whether, in its present role, the UKMF represents the most effective use of those resources. The financial implications of any change in current deployment plans would depend on the outcome of the confidential discussions currently underway in NATO, which cannot yet be predicted.

Military Data Network

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the value of the contract for the new proposed military data network; which firms have submitted bids; and which firms have been shortlisted.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 15 January 1987, c. 307]: The project to which the hon. Member is, I believe, referring is in the planning stage. No tenders have yet been sought, no firms have been short-listed, and no contract has been placed other than for consultancy assistance in project definition and planning. Since tenders will be invited shortly, it would be inappropriate to publish estimates of the value of the contract.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 108

SESSION 1986-87

12th January—23rd January 1987

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc., under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speakers rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R = first reading, 2R = second reading, Money res = money resolution, Com = Committee stage, Rep = Report stage, 3R = third reading, amendt/amendts = amendment/amendments, * = matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.

THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

IN THE FOURTH SESSION OF THE FORTY-NINTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

THIRTY-FIFTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 108

FOURTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1986-87

House of Commons

Monday 12 January 1987

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

DEATHS OF MEMBERS

Mr. Speaker: I regret to have to inform the House of the deaths of David Charles Penhaligon Esquire, Member for Truro, and Nicolas Guy Barnett Esquire, Member for Greenwich, and I desire, on behalf of the House, to express our sense of the loss we have sustained and our sympathy with the relatives of the hon. Members.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

Bus Services

1. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will visit Merseyside to consider at first hand the results of bus deregulation in the area.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): Neither my right hon. Friend nor I have immediate plans to do so.

Mr. Wareing: May I assure the hon. Gentleman that I should be only too ready to take him on a walk round bus stops in Liverpool and Merseyside? It would have to be a walk, because of the irregularity of the buses. It is not on for the Minister simply to say "No", when he must realise the scandal and chaos that have resulted from the disastrous deregulation of the buses on Merseyside. Does he realise that a Merseyside passenger transport executive report stated last week that no fewer than 20 per cent. of passengers have turned to other forms of transport? Does he realise that the report says that what was a good and reasonable service is now completely inefficient and incompetent?

Mr. Mitchell: That is entirely a matter for those on the ground. The extent of the reliability of the operations of a local bus service is nothing to do with the Government or with legislation. It demonstrates the management efficiency of the local operators. In this case, they have not been helped by strikes.

Mr. Fry: Does my hon. Friend recall that only a few years ago between 80 and 90 per cent. of passengers on off-peak Merseyside public transport services paid no fares? That resulted in large sums of public money having to be spent to sustain Merseyside public transport, and that was one of the major reasons for the Government's reorganisation.

Mr. Mitchell: Total ratepayer subsidy on Merseyside last year amounted to nearly £50 per man, woman and child in the area.

Mr. Alton: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that before the Government's legislation the people on Merseyside were very happy with the bus services and that since the legislation bus fares have gone up, services have been slashed and there has been a strike every Saturday, which has inconvenienced the local people of Merseyside? Trench warfare has developed between the company and the users, and the initials MPTA are now thought to stand for, "Make Passenger Transport Awful".

Mr. Mitchell: Those who were using the bus services at subsidised fares may have been happy, but the ratepayers who were having to foot the bill were certainly not happy.

Mr. Sackville: When my hon. Friend visits Merseyside, will he also consider the position in neighbouring Greater Manchester where the passenger transport executive decided to withhold £10 million of the £17 million available and failed to provide an adequate timetable—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about Merseyside.

Mr. Sackville: Will my hon. Friend the Minister draw a comparison with the situation on Merseyside?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is right to compare the way in which Manchester has sought to implement the Act and the position elsewhere in the country. Manchester provided only a skeleton or essential network instead of providing the socially necessary services found elsewhere in Britain.

Mr. Stott: Is the Minister aware that the ratepayers of Merseyside are also electors and that they voted consistently for a proper public transport system? The Minister cannot stand at the Dispatch Box and refuse to accept responsibility for what is happening on Merseyside and elsewhere. Since the Government introduced the Transport Act 1985, transport in Britain has been ruined. Responsibility lies with the Secretary of State and the Minister and not with the MPTA, which is having to put up with the results of that legislation. The Minister bears responsibility, and he was warned what would happen during the passage of the Bill two years ago.

Mr. Mitchell: Whether bus services are reliable and comply with timetables is a matter for local management, not for the Government.

London Underground

2. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps beyond those announced on 28 November he is taking to respond to and implement the recommendations in the report "Crime on the London Underground".

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. John Moore): Our priority is to ensure that the extra £15 million is used to greatest effect. To this end we are in close touch with London Underground and the British Transport police on monitoring the pilot schemes and ensuring that the other recommendations are followed up.

Mr. Cartwright: Although the Secretary of State's reply is welcome, will he confirm that that £15 million is sufficient only to fund pilot schemes in a number of very important crime prevention areas? In view of the seriousness of the problem, will he give an assurance that resources will be available to make crime prevention measures more widely available if the pilot schemes turn out to be successful?

Mr. Moore: The £15 million goes beyond the pilot schemes. The hon. Gentleman and, I believe, all hon. Members rightly support what is being done, and I think that they will first want to see the pilot schemes in operation. The £15 million is spread over three years. I shall not go into the other things on which the money will be spent, but it will be spent on more than pilot schemes. The key issue is not resources, but putting them effectively to work.

Mr. McCrindle: Although I welcome the prospect of there being improved equipment to enable the British Transport police to carry out their task on the London Underground system, is my right hon. Friend satisfied that their establishment is adequate for that? Although equipment is desirable, effectiveness may well depend, at the end of the day, on the number of men available to prevent crime on the London Underground system.

Mr. Moore: I welcome my hon. Friend's comments. However, it is not a matter, in this case, of the number of officers involved. Indeed, the number of British Transport police has increased. We are talking about an improvement in specific facilities. That is what the report sought, and that is what the Government are committed to.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is it not also a crime of sorts for the management of London Regional Transport and of the Underground to disregard and tear up negotiated agreements with the unions? That has led to the strike that is threatened on Wednesday. Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to do anything about the fact that in a 75 per cent. turnout, 82 per cent. voted for a strike on Wednesday——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about crime.

Mr. Banks: Absolutely.

Mr. Moore: The hon. Gentleman's attempt to change the question was the absolute in crime. London Regional Transport staff were asked whether they would oppose the current threat to pay, conditions and employment opportunities by taking industrial action, including strike action if necessary, and were assured by the general-secretary that that would mean that they would not be going to the barricades on 6 January. There is no dispute with London Regional Transport, and in the absence of a dispute, it would be a crime against the travelling public if there were a strike.

London Regional Transport

3. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of London Regional Transport, he will raise with him the improvement of bus and Underground services.

Mr. David Mitchell: Yes, I would expect bus and rail service standards to be among the subjects discussed.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Apart from the threatened strike, which we hope will be averted, will my hon. Friend ask the chairman to take my constituents into his confidence and give them some hope that there will be an end to difficulties on the Central line arising from timetabling, the failure of equipment and work on the track?

Mr. Mitchell: I join my hon. Friend in regretting deeply the proposed strike, which would be an especially callous act. Speed restrictions for essential maintenance have been largely responsible for the level of service on the Central line for my hon. Friend's constituents, and London Regional Transport apologises for delays. It has plans for new signalling and new rolling stock.

Mr. Spearing: Will the Minister explain why the world-famous driving school at Chiswick has been closed? Will he comment on the allegation that it is possible for private contractors to hire men with public service vehicle licences who have not been eligible for employment on London Transport buses for health reasons?

Mr. Mitchell: The closure of the Chiswick driving school is outside the scope of the question, but I shall certainly write to the hon. Gentleman about that.

Mr. Chapman: Will my hon. Friend confirm that in recent months there has been an unprecedented rise in the number of passengers using the Underground service and that this is being reflected by the LRT management in the provision of additional services? Is he aware that some problems arise from the new timetables which were introduced at the beginning of November in the light of staffing problems, but will he recognise that the more people who use the Underground the more the Government should look favourably on providing increased capital expenditure for this vital part of our public transport network?

Mr. Mitchell: I agree with my hon. Friend. Last year there were 1,900 million passenger journeys on the LRT network, including an all-time record level of Underground patronage. LRT's investment level is at an all-time record this year and is planned to be even greater next year.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Now that the London Docklands Development Corporation has shown an interest in linking the east London line and the Bakerloo and Northern lines at the Elephant and Castle so that there is an east-west link south of the river as well as the proposed docklands light railway north of the river, will the Minister ask his Department to take a positive interest in the improvement of services south of the river, east-west, so that a natural circuit can be completed and we do not have the present difficulty of travelling in a congested part of south London which is a white hole in the underground network?

Mr. Mitchell: I shall draw the hon. Gentleman's point to the chairman's attention.

Mr. Sims: When my hon. Friend sees the chairman of London Transport, will he tell him that I still receive complaints about the quality of London Transport bus services, but that in recent months I have had the unusual experience of receiving compliments about contracted-out services, especially the 61 service in my constituency, which is run by Metrobus Ltd.? Is there not a moral to be drawn from this, and will he bring it to the chairman's notice?

Mr. Mitchell: London Transport has started a programme of putting out to competitive tender a series of routes. Some of the routes have been won by London Buses Ltd. and some by outside companies. Standards appear to be satisfactory, and in a number of instances better than they were before.

Mr. Snape: Has the Minister ever travelled on the Underground in London? If he has from time to time, can he account for the fact that throughout the system there are unmanned booking offices, ticket machines that are either out of order or switched off altogether, and unmanned stations, especially after 6 o'clock or 7 o'clock in the evening, yet London Regional Transport's management can still hand back about £20 million to the Government, presumably because it is not needed? Will he reflect on the fact that at £20 million the knighthood for the chairman of London Regional Transport must be one of the most expensive baubles known since Lloyd George was alive?

Mr. Mitchell: First, I travel on the London Underground from time to time. Secondly, I consider that the hon. Gentleman has made a cheap and nasty jibe at a gentleman who has provided distinguished public service and who is not here to answer back.

Motorways

4. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received representations about the speed of traffic upon motorways.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): The Department receives representations on a wide range of road safety issues, including speeds on motorways. Ninety eight per cent. of accidents are on other roads.

Mr. Baker: Is my hon. Friend aware that the 70 mph speed limit on motorways is not being enforced? Will he have a word with the Home Secretary, if there are substantial safety or oil conservation grounds, and ask him to enforce the present speed limit? If, as I believe is the case, there are no such grounds, will my hon. Friend bear in mind that we have the lowest motorway speed limit of any major country in western Europe? Will he seek to raise the limit to a realistic level?

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend will be interested to know that there are over 30,000 prosecutions a year for motorway offences. I shall do as he suggests and have a word with colleagues in the Home Office. I am sure that the suggestion that the motorway speed limit should be raised will not find favour.

Mr. Merlyn Rees: Will the Under-Secretary of State take a representation from me about the lack of regard for the 50 mph speed limit at contraflows? That is where accidents take place. It is my view that the indicators for a 50 mph speed limit are not clear enough, given the situation at contraflows, and that is dangerous.

Mr. Bottomley: I shall review the signs. It is important that, unless advised otherwise, people stick to motorways, even where there are contraflows. Even with contraflows, with their increased dangers, motorways are still safer than other roads. It might be a seasonal time to remind everyone that the speed limit is the limit. It is not supposed to be an average. In bad weather conditions—whether fog or ice—people should reduce their speeds.

Mr. Higgins: My hon. Friend does not intend to raise the 70 mph limit on motorways. This will encourage even more the maniacs who occupy outside lanes. Will he please erect 70 mph signs on motorways? At the moment there is no indication or reminder of what the limit is, in contrast, for example, with France, where the limit is constantly repeated.

Mr. Bottomley: I am considering the suggestion of erecting 70 mph signs. Everyone who has passed the driving test at any stage since the war should know that the old unrestricted speed limit went a long time ago. I shall do what I can to remind people of the need to keep to the speed limit. Raising the speed limit from 70 mph would not be applauded universally. I do not propose such action.

Mr. Haynes: When will the Minister wake up to the fact that his Government have introduced more transport legislation than any other Government? The result is that the motorway system is cluttered with all sorts of vehicles, including buses. The important point is that there is far too much traffic bunching. Why does the Minister not seriously consider raising the motorway speed limit so that we avoid some of the accidents?

Mr. Bottomley: I suggest to hon. Members that the way to deal with accidents is to slow down rather than to speed up. Bunching can take place at any speed, and the slower the speed of the bunch, the better.

Mr. Adley: Will my hon. Friend contemplate the simple proposition that, with more than 5,000 people killed and 250,000 people maimed on the roads every year, safety standards on our motorways and other roads are virtually non-existent when compared with the stringent safety requirements laid down for British Rail? When will the Government make road transport subject to the same safety rules and requirements as are laid down for rail transport?

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend will know, or will be interested to hear if he does not know, that motorways carry 13 per cent. of national vehicle mileage but have only 2 per cent of accidents. Although motorway safety is an important subject, it is even more important in urban areas —built-up areas—where there is over 40 per cent. of the traffic and 80 per cent. of the accidents. A real reduction in the number of people who die on our roads—5,000—will be achieved by attention to built-up area traffic and other matters such as drink driving.

Written-off Vehicles

5. Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has taken any action to end the practice whereby vehicles which have been written off are allowed to re-appear on the market.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): We are reviewing the problems associated with written-off vehicles with the police, insurers and other interested bodies to see whether there are ways in which the present situation can be improved.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Minister accept that there is an accumulating body of evidence that ripping off customers by unscrupulous car dealers is becoming far too widespread and, in some cases, dangerous to the customers? Will he therefore consider making certain that no vehicle registration document is issued from Swansea for any vehicle that has been written off, or, if he cannot go that far, will he at least make sure that it is printed on every document that the car has been written off, so that the customer might have some redress through fair trading legislation?

Mr. Spicer: We are aware that there is considerable public concern about this matter. The working party should report within the next two or three months. It has been set up with a view to seeing whether we can get more rigid guidelines for what constitutes a write off and what can be done to make severe accident history more readily available to the public, and, as the hon. Gentleman asks, we seek to ensure that potentially hazardous vehicles are kept off the road.

Mr. Heddle: Does my hon. Friend accept that probably the poorer members of the community are forced to buy those potential death traps because they are the cheaper cars on the forecourt of the second-hand car lot? Perhaps those people would not go to the Automobile Association for an independent structural survey beforehand. At the moment, the power of monitoring is vested in the county trading officers, who can see the cars only after they have been bought. Will my hon. Friend consider giving the police power, where there is a suspicion that such death traps are on second-hand car lot forecourts, to enter those forecourts to examine the cars before they are sold?

Mr. Spicer: The police already have powers to investigate accidents when write offs occur, so police powers already exist. The question is whether one should have more rigid guidelines on what constitutes a write off. That is the real problem.

Docklands Light Railway

6. Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consultations he has had with the London Docklands Development Corporation concerning the funding of the Beckton extension of the docklands light railway.

Mr. David Mitchell: We expect to receive LDDC's formal proposals for financing the Beckton extension of the docklands light railway later this month. In the meantime my officials, together with those of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, have been discussing with LDDC the form that those proposals might take.

Mr. Spearing: Is the Minister aware that everybody in the area wants that railway, and wants it to be provided by public funds? There is also a desire for it to be routed via Canning Town. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is open to him to let the Second Reading of the Bill go forward, and if he receives the financial guarantees from the LDDC that he seeks, then and only then should he approve its construction? Is that not the best way to proceed?

Mr. Mitchell: I am in some doubt whether everyone takes the view that the railway should be provided by public funds. The LDDC believes, and its research suggests, that large increases in land values in the docklands when the railway is built can be harnessed to pay for it. I plan to visit the area to see for myself on Wednesday this week, and I hope to see the hon. Gentleman on that occasion.

Mr. Stanbrook: Is my hon. Friend aware that this is a very important and desirable development, which will bring great advantages to the people of that part of London? Will he give all the assistance that the Government are able to give to that project?

Mr. Mitchell: I am well aware of my hon. Friend's interest in and connections with the area. I hope that I shall also have the opportunity to see him on my visit on Wednesday, and I shall keep in mind the point that he made.

Mr. Tony Banks: As the railway will be funded by private developers — indeed, it is just a developers' railway—may I point out that there are other transport needs in Newham that must be met? That is why my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and myself argue that the railway should be provided out of public funds so that it can meet public need in the area.

Mr. Mitchell: If the same objective can be achieved without use of the public purse, it seems to be wholly desirable that it should so be.

M25 (Service Areas)

7. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Transport what sites are being considered for the construction of service areas on the M25.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A service area is already in partial operation at South Mimms, and Esso has been chosen to develop another at Thurrock. Our proposal for a site at Clacket lane near Westerham has recently been the subject of a public inquiry, together with other proposals by private developers. We are still considering proposals for Iver.

Mr. Smith: Is my hon. Friend aware that it is proposed that the service area at Iver should be built on green belt land between two built-up areas in my constituency—Richings park and Iver village? Because that would be so close to hundreds of houses, there is considerable local opposition. Will my hon. Friend consider looking at a more suitable site?

Mr. Bottomley: The consultants tried to identify other more suitable sites, but I am not sure whether one was found. I shall bear my hon. Friend's considerations in mind. We understand that considerable landscaping would be undertaken to shield housing from environmental intrusions.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is there any restriction on military vehicles using service areas, especially as nuclear warheads are frequently transported on our motorways, and bearing in mind the serious accident that took place at the weekend? Is the Minister not concerned about the use of public roads for that purpose?

Mr. Bottomley: I am not sure that military convoys often use motorway service areas.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Will my hon. Friend confirm that no service area is to be placed in Loughton or elsewhere in the Epping Forest constituency?

Mr. Bottomley: I was asked where we proposed to have motorway service areas on the M25, and my hon. Friend's area of concern is not one that I mentioned.

Mr. Madden rose——

Mr. Speaker: The question is about the M25.

Mr. Madden: Indeed, Mr. Speaker. What provision is being made for facilities for those driving heavy goods vehicles on the M25, and what is the general policy on the provision of such facilities on the motorway network?

Mr. Bottomley: One of the reasons why we maintain strict control over motorway service areas is to ensure the availability of some services which may not otherwise be provided. We take the provision of rest facilities for heavy goods vehicle drivers seriously and ensure that they are provided in motorway service areas.

Settle to Carlisle Line

8. Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to announce his decision concerning the application by British Rail for the closure of the Settle to Carlisle line.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have only recently received the joint report of the transport users consultative committees for north-eastern and north-western England and British Rail's financial case. I cannot say how long it will take to consider these reports carefully, together with other relevant factors.

Mr. Waller: I know that my hon. Friend takes a close interest in the future of this line and has visited it. As the TUCCs came out unanimously in favour of the retention of the line and thousands of people wrote in support of that approach, does my hon. Friend agree that it could be seen as perverse to take a decision which did not involve the retention of the line? At the same time, does he agree that it would be unreasonable to make such a decision without allowing for the provision of funds which are particularly necessary for repairs, and that such funds could come from the Government's tourism budget?

Mr. Mitchell: As I have only just received the report I cannot possibly pre-empt a decision at this stage. I take note of my hon. Friend's point about the availability of funds from alternative sources, including tourism.

Mr. Wallace: If the Minister has had a chance to read some of the report, does he accept that it shows that British Rail has not made a detailed case for closure? Apart from the hardship caused to local people by closure, there appears to be considerable potential for further marketing and promotion of this line to make it even more profitable than it has been until now. Should not the Government take that approach, rather than entertain any possibility of closure?

Mr. Mitchell: It may be helpful to say that it is not part of the TUCCs' role to consider British Rail's case for closure. Its job is to consider what hardship would be caused if the line were closed and to report to Ministers on that. That is why British Rail's case was not deployed before them. We now have British Rail's financial case and we are considering it together with the report of the TUCCs.

Mr. Watson: I appreciate that my hon. Friend cannot pre-empt his decision, but is he aware of strong rumours circulating locally and in British Rail that this line will be kept open? In those circumstances, will he confirm that any decision on his part to close the line would be greeted with some surprise and dismay?

Mr. Mitchell: I can report to my hon. Friend that there are rumours in British Rail and among the public that the line is to be kept open and that there are also rumours that it is to be closed.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Is the Minister aware that a great deal of pleasure has been expressed at the TUCCs' recommendation that the Settle-Carlisle line should remain open?

Although one understands the pure technicalities of that decision, will the Minister take clearly into account the potential economic benefits to British Rail of keeping it open? In making his decision about finance, which I hope he will announce at the same time, will he avail himself of that escape hatch offered to him by his hon. Friend and try to raise the money from somewhere else and simply square up to the fact that the Government must provide the money for British Rail to do the essential repairs to keep the line open?

Mr. Mitchell: Of course we will consider carefully the points which the hon. Gentleman has properly made. I accept entirely that the economic factors, and particularly the effect on Appleby as the largest town to be isolated if the railway line is closed, must be taken into account and that they are separate from the questions of hardship which the TUCCs considered.

Road Safety

9. Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further action after the Christmas drink drive campaign he proposes on road safety publicity.

Mr. John Moore: Our clear-cut "Don't Drink and Drive" campaign won strong public support. I shall follow it up in the spring and autumn. This will reinforce the message that drinking and driving is a year-round problem and must be tackled as seriously as we can.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Further to my right hon. Friend's reply, is he aware that in Scotland a campaign group is being formed of some of the relatives of bereaved families whose relatives have been killed through reckless driving? Is he further aware that a point which they make is that if the periods of disqualification for driving were much longer that would constitute an effective deterrent?

Mr. Moore: I was not aware of the particular Scottish illustration to which my hon. Friend has drawn my attention, and I shall certainly draw it to the attention of my colleagues in the Home Office.

The Government will do all in their power to ensure effectively that we control the appalling problem in this country of drinking and driving. I shall certainly consider the point which my hon. Friend has made.

Mr. Boyes: Does the Minister recognise the strength of the powerful campaign that was run over Christmas time? Many hon. Members welcome the Secretary of State's undertaking to carry the campaign on throughout the year. Will the Secretary of State give three further undertakings? First, will he make the message even stronger? Secondly, will he consider stronger sentences for people convicted of drink driving offences? Thirdly, as an indication of his good will, will he reduce further the acceptable blood alcohol limit of people caught drinking and driving?

Mr. Moore: In relation to the particular points that have been raised, I have listened very carefully to the public reaction. I was especially delighted with the media reaction to the message and I hear what the hon. Gentleman says about making it even stronger and clearer. I shall certainly consider that sympathetically. I am not sure that sentencing policy—although that is not my departmental job—is the key in this area, as opposed to trying to change attitudes, which is what we are seeking to do through our campaigns, which are supported by the private and the public sectors. I shall consider anything that will help in this area.

M40 (Waterstock-Wendlebury)

10. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the public inquiry on the Waterstock to Wendlebury section of the M40 to begin; how long he expects it to last; and when he expects to be able to publish his decision.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Draft orders for this section of the M40 will be published shortly. A public inquiry could take place six to nine months later.

I cannot say how long it will last or when the decision will come.

Mr. Baldry: Will my hon. Friend simply confirm two points: first, that, irrespective of the length of the public inquiry, it is the Government's firm intention that the whole of the M40 extension from Oxford to Birmingham should be opened as one complete entity, and, secondly, that it is the Government's firm intention that the whole of the motorway extension should be opened by 1990?

Mr. Bottomley: Subject to the outcome of statutory procedures, the aim is to start construction on the Waterstock to Wendlebury section in time to open the whole of the M40 extension from Waterstock to Warwick at about the same time, which is about the end of 1990.

European Community (Air Transport)

11. Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress was made during the United Kingdom presidency to secure the liberalisation of air transport within the European Community.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Solid progress has been made on the contents of a three-year first step towards full liberalisation by the agreed target date of 1992.

There is now unanimous support for our proposals on capacity and a substantial majority in favour of our ideas on market access. Seven states support our proposals for cheaper fares.

Mr. Galley: My hon. Friend is to be heartily congratulated on the progress made during the past few months on the liberalisation of air transport. In view, however, of the dilatory, often hostile, attitude of many of our EEC partners, what concrete steps can he take during the next few months, during the Belgian presidency and thereafter, to quicken the pace of reforms? Furthermore, is he satisfied that British airlines, especially British Airways, will be well placed to take full advantage of a more competitive regime?

Mr. Spicer: I thank my hon. Friend for his earlier remarks. Our proposals provide for a great deal more competition between airlines in Europe and will undoubtedly reduce air fares there. As to my hon. Friend's main question, we shall fully support the Belgian presidency in it efforts to finalise the package. We also intend to enter into further bilateral discussions with certain Governments, and in particular I am arranging to have discussions with the French Minister in early February.

Dornoch Firth

12. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, in the light of the Mackay Consultants report "The Social and Economic Case for the Dornoch Firth Rail Bridge", he will meet a deputation of local interests further to consider the financing of a rail crossing of the Dornoch Firth.

Mr. David Mitchell: No, Sir. British Rail has not to date submitted an investment proposal, either based on the Mackay report or not.

Mr. Maclennan: Will the Minister clarify the position, because the Mackay report says that British Rail could put forward a proposal based only on financial considerations and that a cost-benefit analysis is needed? Will that cost-benefit analysis have to be done by British Rail, or will the Government do it themselves? Will they do it as a matter of urgency, as the cost of constructing a rail bridge in association with a road bridge is much less than if one has to be built subsequently?

Mr. Mitchell: The Mackay Consultants' report is being considered by the Government, but nothing has yet persuaded us that we should interfere with British Rail's judgment. The expenditure for British Rail would amount to some £12·7 million and the amount of revenue that would be at risk if the Dornoch bridge were not proceeded with for rail connection would be only £120,000 per year. The hon. Gentleman will see that there is a dramatic difference between the outlay and the potential financial saving. The point made by the consultants on the cost benefit is being considered by the Government.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

State Security

51. Mr. Dubs asked the Attorney-General how many prosecutions under the Official Secrets Act there have been since 1979.

52. Mr. Spearing asked the Attorney-General if he will make a statement concerning recent consultations he has had with the Director of Public Prosecutions concerning prosecutions under the Official Secrets Act.

54. Mr. Janner asked the Attorney-General what recent discussions he has had with the Director of Public Prosecutions concerning cases currently under consideration involving alleged offences under the Official Secrets Act.

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): Since 1979 there have been 16 prosecutions under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911, including two which were not proceeded with. During the same period there have been seven prosecutions under section 1, including one which was not proceeded with, and three under section 7 of the 1920 Act. Five cases under section 2 are presently pending before the courts.

The consent of the Attorney-General is required before any prosecution under the Official Secrets Acts may proceed, and this may be granted either on the basis of a written request by the Director of Public Prosecutions, or after a discussion. Recently I met the Director of Public Prosecutions and we discussed the various cases which are under consideration arising out of the Wright case and its wider aspects.

Mr. Dubs: Does it not seem that in recent years the motive in deciding whether there should be prosecutions under the Official Secrets Act was more to avoid political embarrassment than for any other reason? While I appreciate that, until the Wright case is over, the Attorney-General cannot make a full statement, would it not be right, when the case is completed, for him to make a full and frank statement to the House as to the basis on which future prosecutions under the Act will be carried out?

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. Gentleman to a list published in answer to a question by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), on 15 December last year, which discloses the type of offence. There are too many cases of people who have for money given information that is subject to the Official Secrets Act, such as police officers who have given details of previous criminal offences and things of that kind. I intend to make a full statement the moment that I am able to do so.

Mr. Spearing: Is it not frequently the case that Governments, faced with the publication of unpalatable facts, engineer or promote the leakage of those facts from Select Committee or minority reports of Select Committees, or by other means? Bearing in mind the dual responsibilities of Law Officers of the Crown, political on the one hand and legal on the other, is it not a principle that their legal actions, particularly in matters relating to prosecutions, or lack of action relating to prosecutions, should be, and should be seen to be, wholly on the legal side of their functions?

The Attorney-General: I entirely agree with that. I assure the House that there is no question of a political basis for any decision that I or my right hon. and learned Friend have taken in any case under the Official Secrets Act.

Mr. Janner: Has the Attorney-General considered himself, or discussed with the Director of Public Prosecutions, the workings of this archaic and terrible old Act? For example, has he considered whether or not it would be a breach of the Act for information to be given to the public concerning the horrific dangers arising from the crashes of military convoys, such as that which occurred this weekend, about which public-spirited citizens saw fit to tell the public? Had they not done so, the public would not have known about the crash.

The Attorney-General: The basis upon which I operate was given in an oral answer to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) as far back as 9 April 1984. The hon. and learned Gentleman knows that in appropriate circumstances Ministers themselves can authorise disclosure.

Mr. Aitken: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the Attorney-General of the day is frequently put in a virtually impossible position by the Act? On the one hand the Law Officers have a clear duty to enforce the law, while on the other, the law is so widely drafted that it is virtually unenforceable without bizarre selectivity in the exercise of the prosecutor's discretion. When my right hon. and learned Friend makes his statement, will he therefore place himself firmly on the side of the reformers of the Official Secrets Act?

The Attorney-General: Inevitably the decisions that I, the Director of Public Prosecutions and my right hon. and learned Friend have to take are sometimes described as political decisions. However, I assure the House that we look at each case entirely wearing our quasi-judicial hats. We are not influenced in any way by the political consequences. Sometimes, as my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) said, one is put in an impossible position. However, we use our discretion and our best judgment.

Mr. Stanbrook: Despite the comparatively wide terms in which the Official Secrets Act is drafted, do not the figures revealed by my right hon. and learned Friend's original reply show that because the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions is required there is a proper balance between the public interest and the enforcement of the law in every case and that, given the discretion that can be exercised by the Director of Public Prosecutions, and in the absence of any serious suggestions for reform of the Act, the present system is working much better than one might have expected?

The Attorney-General: My hon. Friend must appreciate that it is primarily my decision, but always I am advised by the DPP, and in many cases I am also advised by counsel.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: And by the Prime Minister.

The Attorney-General: Certainly not. There is no question——

Mr. Skinner: The Prime Minister's dish cloth.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Attorney-General: Now that I have a moment to reply, there is no question, ever, in any single case under the Official Secrets Act or, indeed, in any case involving a criminal prosecution, of my having been ordered or directed in any way by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I have no sympathy at all with those who reveal real state secrets, but the ludicrous Australian trial and the Official Secrets Act combined have not even preserved the Government's dignity in the Wright case. Will the Attorney-General confirm that if Wright were to decide to publish in Ireland, following the Miller case, the chances of successfully preventing publication would be very slight? In the light of that, is the House not entitled to a Government statement on the future of the Official Secrets Act? Once Mr. Justice Powell has announced his decision, will the Attorney-General make a full statement to the House about the Government's handling of the Wright case?

The Attorney-General: On the Australian case, I should have thought that it would be absolutely apparent to the hon. Gentleman that it involves a very important principle, namely, that those who promise to keep quiet for the rest of their lives should keep that promise. It is very interesting that I cannot find a single hon. Member, on either side of the House, who has received a letter complaining about that.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Can the Attorney-General tell the House if any useful purpose is served by prosecuting people who reveal matters of ancient history which can do no possible damage to the state and who, by reason of the threat of prosecution, feel driven to leave the United Kingdom?

The Attorney-General: Let us get the procedure clear. I am surprised that the hon. and learned Gentleman does not appreciate the position. The case in Australia is not a prosecution — it is civil proceedings for an injunction. Whether the person concerned left to go to Tasmania because of the book or for other reasons, I simply do not know. The principle remains, and it is one that we are determined to uphold.

53. Mr. Greenway asked the Attorney-General what is the cost to date to public funds of the case being brought against publication of Mr. Wright's book in Australia; and if he will make a statement.

56. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Attorney-General what has been the cost to public funds of the action taken against Mr. Peter Wright in the Australian courts; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The total cost to public funds to date of the court action in Australia concerning the publication of a book by Mr. Peter Wright, including legal fees paid to date, and fares and subsistence for civil servants, is estimated to be of the order of £170,000.

Mr. Greenway: Even if counsel's fees considerably increased that figure, is [illegible] money spent in this way on proceedings against Mr. Wright necessary in order to deter ill-motivated ex-MI5 employees from damaging the security of the nation? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that in future every ex-MI5 employee who breaks the Official Secrets Act should have all pension and emoluments ended forthwith?

The Attorney-General: I agree entirely with the first part of my hon. Friend's question, but the latter part of his question is not a matter for me.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: As there is now quite a lot of public money involved, will the Attorney-General tell us whether the action was taken because Mr. Wright broke the rules of confidentiality, or because the material in his proposed publication was considered damaging to national security?

The Attorney-General: The principal purpose of those proceedings is to preserve the principle that those who have promised to keep the secrets do so.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid Policy

62. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of the current overseas aid programme and budget is channelled through multilateral agencies and bilateral Government agreements, respectively.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Chris Patten): In 1985-86, the latest year for which figures are available, Britain's contributions to multilateral aid agencies accounted for 42 per cent. of gross aid programme expenditure, and total bilateral aid for 58 per cent. Bilateral country programmes amounted to 40 per cent. of total expenditure.

Mr. Chapman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that information. Can he say whether there has been any change in those proportions in recent years, and will he confirm that, generally speaking, long-term sustained aid projects can be more effectively attained through bilateral Government agreements and that a major role for multilateral agencies should be to assist in providing short-term emergency aid when necessary?

Mr. Patten: By and large I agree with my hon. Friend. There has not been much change in the balance in the past few years, except that our membership of the Community has had some effect because of the size of the European Community programme. Multilateral agencies have an important role to play. For example, UNICEF, which I am hoping to visit next week, has an important role. That point was put to me by the late hon. Member for Greenwich, Guy Barnett, shortly before his death. He felt strongly about these issues and the House will miss his contributions in debates about aid and development, about which he felt so passionately and about which he knew so much.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the Minister confirm that the relative increase in the proportion paid by way of multilateral aid has nothing to do with Government policy, but has more to do with the drop in total aid given by the Government? Does he not think that recipient countries can get far more value from multilateral aid than from bilateral aid, which has conditions attached?

Mr. Patten: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's second proposition. In relation to his first proposition I am pleased to say that in the last three or four years our aid programme has been increasing and, based on the public expenditure figures, over the next three years it should be secured in real terms.

Mr. Bowen Wells: While congratulating my hon. Friend on maintaining the increase in the overseas development budget, may I ask him whether he agrees that he can accommodate the increased aid and trade provision and the increased demands of multilateral agencies only by increasing the total aid budget so that there is more in the bilateral budget, thus supporting the efforts of the Department of Trade and Industry in promoting British exports and interests overseas?

Mr. Patten: I hope that I can satisfy my hon. Friend yet again in the next few weeks by announcing some small increases in our contributions to the multilateral agencies and increases in some of our most important bilateral programmes.

Chile

63. Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the votes cast by the representative of Her Majesty's Government concerning recent loans to Chile by the Inter-American Development Bank.

Mr. Chris Patten: After weighing the views of the members of his constituency and obtaining satisfactory answers to technical questions that we had raised, our executive director supported the loans for a hydro-electric project and a global neighbourhood improvement and sites-and-services programme.

Dame Judith Hart: First, may I express my appreciation for what the Minister said about the sad death of our friend Guy Barnett, the late hon. Member for Greenwich?

Given that Britain was the only country to vote in favour of the recent World Bank loan to Chile—even the United States abstained — and since we provide military training for Chileans and supply ships to Chile, would it not be better if the Government confessed that, apart from paying lip-service to the EEC condemnation of Pinochet in Chile, they completely support him?

Mr. Patten: Uncharacteristically, the right hon. Lady is wrong on this issue. She is wrong to say that Britain was the only country, of the larger donors, to support the World Bank loan. As she knows, although I think she disagrees with what I shall say on this, we always judge issues in the international financial institutions entirely on technical grounds, as we are bound to do by the IADB and World Bank articles of agreement.

Mr. Stuart Holland: I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House agree with the remarks made by the Minister and by my right hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart) about the tragic death of Guy Barnett, the late hon. Member for Greenwich. His commitment to development issues, not only in the Commons but in the Commonwealth and in developing countries, will be sorely missed.

The Minister cannot get away as easily from the matter of the IADB loan to Chile as he has tried to do.

Mr. Forth: Why not?

Mr. Holland: Because the reality is that the Inter-American Development Bank loan, with the World Bank and International Finance Corporation loan, and loans for projects currently under appraisal, total about £1,000 million. They have either been made or are in the pipeline. Apart from anything else, this includes $150 million support for a pulp and paper factory in a country with no press freedoms. Less than 3 per cent. of the total package will go to social development projects. The World Bank loan to Chile was passed by only 1·7 per cent. of the vote. Mr. Elliott Abrahams of the United States managed to persuade his master that the United States should abstain. What was the weakness in the Minister's case? Could he not handle his mistress and persuade her that he should have opposed this loan to what is still a dictatorship?

Mr. Patten: May I be permitted a brief reply to that question? Article VIII, section 5(f) of the World Bank's articles prohibits the bank from being influenced in its decisions by the political character of the borrowing member concerned and requires such decisions to be based only upon economic considerations impartially weighed. We made perfectly clear before the General Assembly on 18 November, and our ambassador made clear on 20 November, what we think of the Chilean human rights record.

EC (Aid Ministers)

65. Mr. Cox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the aid Ministers of other EEC countries; and what issues were discussed.

Mr. Chris Patten: I chaired the Council of European Community Development Ministers on 11 November. The main topics covered were food aid reform, aid for population activities and programming of the sixth European development fund.

Mr. Cox: I note the Minister's reply and welcome the discussion on food aid, but what meaningful action will be taken in Europe to ensure that suitable food surpluses are made available to countries that face hunger and poverty? Is the Minister aware that such a policy would be received with much greater support in Britain than is the present policy, under which surplus food seems to be sold off at giveaway prices to eastern Europe and is then sold in those countries at enormous profits, which are made at the expense of British taxpayers?

Mr. Patten: I am pleased to say that, during our presidency of the Community, we secured reform of the Community's food aid regulation. That should now mean that food goes to the developing countries to meet their needs rather than as a means of surplus disposal. Food aid will now be better integrated with general Community development programmes, and the procedures will be streamlined so that people in emergencies get food far more rapidly. I think that that reform is one of the most important things that we achieved during our presidency and that that view is widely shared in Europe.

Administrative and Technical Services

66. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will expand schemes for the provision of administrative and technical services to developing countries.

Mr. Chris Patten: In recent years we have devoted increasing resources to the provision of skilled manpower and training in technical, administrative and other areas. Our programmes of technical co-operation are designed to build up the human resources of individual developing countries and are planned in close consultation with their Governments.

Mr. Baker: Is my hon. Friend aware that such programmes are strongly welcomed on this side of the House? Will he also see whether he can achieve a substantial expansion in the Voluntary Service Overseas programme for young people from the present figure of about 1,000 a year?

Mr. Patten: I hope that I can satisfy my hon. Friend on that. Our aid to the British volunteer programme has been increased by 113 per cent. in real terms since 1979 and it will increase by a further 11·5 per cent. next year, taking it to £8·6 million as opposed to about £2 million in 1979. That is a formidable record.

I am sure that the House is aware of the murder of the VSO's field director, Mr. Paul Hitchman, in Uganda last week. That was a reminder of the brave and committed work of many of our young volunteers overseas, and I am sure that the House would want to offer its condolences to Mrs. Hitchman.

Earl of Stockton (Tributes)

3.31 pm

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): Since we last met, and in addition to the other sorrows that you have reported to us today, Mr. Speaker, we heard the sad news of the death of Harold Macmillan, the Earl of Stockton. We mourn his loss and send our deepest sympathies to his family.

We pay tribute to his memory and to a life which spanned the transition from empire to Commonwealth and Community; from the Victorian to our present Elizabethan age. His part in that history began in the trenches of the western front in the first world war, where he served with distinction. He was wounded three times, most seriously during the battle of the Somme. His experiences in that war—the slaughter of the trenches and the loss of so many of his friends—imbued him with a profound horror of war which remained with him throughout his life.

In his autobiography, he said of his generation:

"We almost began to feel a sense of guilt at not having shared the fate of our friends and comrades.

We certainly felt an obligation to make some decent use of the life that had been spared to us".

The phrase "some decent use" is a characteristic understatement.

Harold Macmillan entered this House as the Member for Stockton, a seat which he held from 1924 to 1945 with a break of only two years — 1929 to 1931. His subsequent choice of the title, Earl of Stockton, testifies to the affection and concern he felt for his constituency and its people. The deprivation which he saw there made its mark on him and left him determined to raise the standard of life for all the people of this country. His firm belief that economic freedom is a necessary condition for political freedom is one which he continued to stress throughout his political career.

He became a Minister during the second world war and proved outstandingly successful, first as a junior Minister to Herbert Morrison, for whom he developed a warm regard, and, secondly, as Minister Resident in Algiers, which gave him the ideal opportunity to exercise both his diplomatic and his administrative skills. He became virtually viceroy in the Mediterranean and played a major part in drafting the peace treaty with Italy and in saving Greece from Communism. The late Richard Crossman, who worked for Harold Macmillan at the time, paid him this tribute, describing him as "a dashing man of action, self-confidently poised in his behaviour, gambling on his hunches and, when we lost, as we sometimes did, loyal to his subordinates".

Having been in office, it was a bitter blow to Harold Macmillan when the Conservative party lost the 1945 election and he lost his seat at Stockton. However, he soon returned as the Member for Bromley and set about framing a political approach which would take this country into the post-war era.

Harold Macmillan returned to office after the Conservative victory in 1951 as Minister for Housing. It was the post which made him a popular and widely acclaimed political personality. He combined a great organising ability with a zest for political communication. His success was a major contribution to the post-war improvement in living standards.

His achievements as Housing Minister were followed later by his subsequent work as Chancellor of the Exchequer. He understood the aspiration of people for a better way of life. Material success was, in Harold Macmillan's view, nothing to be ashamed of. With his characteristic flair for a popular idea, he was responsible for the introduction of premium bonds, which even today, 30 years later, are a part of the lives of millions of people.

When in 1957, after Suez, Harold Macmillan became Prime Minister, his first task was to restore Britain's confidence and standing in the world. He re-established the special relationship with the United States through his close friendships with President Eisenhower and President Kennedy. He made a substantial contribution to the relaxation of tension between the Soviet Union and the West, most notably through his work to achieve the nuclear test ban treaty.

As with so much of his life, he was motivated in the search for peace by his sombre memories from the great war. But he also understood that peace was best served by a strong defence, and at Nassau he negotiated the Polaris agreement which allowed Britain to continue to enjoy the protection of an independent nuclear deterrent.

Under his leadership, withdrawal from empire continued in as orderly and peaceful a way as possible. It was in character that such a radical policy was executed with such shrewd caution. There was no more telling political phrase than "the wind of change", which he pronounced during his African tour in 1960.

Harold Macmillan will also be remembered by his work for European co-operation, and in particular for paving the way for British membership of the European Community. The second world war persuaded him that a new political order was needed in Europe to heal the divisions that had caused the conflicts of 1914 and again of 1939. He saw most clearly that the emergence of Russia and America as global powers required a more unified European voice if her counsel were not to be lost.

As Prime Minister he launched a determined bid to secure British membership of the European Community, and, although his initiative was thwarted by the opposition of President de Gaulle, he nevertheless had the satisfaction of seeing his ambitions fulfilled when my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), as Prime Minister, secured British membership of the Community in 1972.

Harold Macmillan loved this House, and I believe the House returned his affection. There are only a handful now in the House who were Members with him. I recall vividly his dominance in the early years of the 1959 Parliament before illness compelled him to relinquish office in 1963.

In his retirement Harold Macmillan occupied a unique place in the nation's affections. He continued to play his role as Chancellor of the University of Oxford, a position he held for over a quarter of a century, and which gave him immense enjoyment. He wrote an autobiography full of insight into the age in which he had lived. And when, on his 90th birthday, he became the Earl of Stockton he found another public platform from which to stimulate, inspire and not least entertain us.

For over six decades Harold Macmillan served his country, as a man of courage, determination, wit, and compassion. He lived through a period torn by great conflict, political upheaval, social change and technological advance. But always Harold Macmillan kept his eye firmly and positively on the future.

[The Prime Minister]

He showed generations to come how to grasp the opportunities of the future, while never forgetting the legacy of the past. As he said on the closing page of the sixth and last volume of his autobiography:

"Nothing in my long experience or in my observations of the youth of today makes me fear that the people of Britain, in every walk of life, will shrink from the new challenge or fail to rise to the level of events.

But to do so they must restore and strengthen the moral and spiritual, as well as the material, base on which they have rested for so many generations through so many troubles and tribulations."

His vision of the future tells us as much about the man as it does about our country.

All of us, Mr. Speaker, today feel the greatness of the example set by Harold Macmillan and the corresponding magnitude of the nation's loss.

3.41 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): We pay tribute today to Harold Macmillan, Earl of Stockton, but I am sure that he would have been the last to object to my taking this opportunity to voice also the deep sorrow which Members in all parts of the House feel at the sudden and tragic deaths of two other parliamentarians, Guy Barnett and David Penhaligon, which you, Mr. Speaker, reported earlier. In every case, the deaths of these men diminish us all and we mourn with their families and loved ones.

Lord Stockton is remembered in many ways—as a soldier of great valour; as a scholar; as a business man who had the acumen to recognise a winner and sell Keynes's "General Theory" at a mere 5s., while selling the "Treatise on Money" at 30s. His theatrical abilities are recalled by many, friend and foe alike, with admiration and affection. By a few, they are, inevitably, recalled with an unworthy carping. Assessments of Lord Stockton's political career have also, inevitably, received mixed notices.

I simply say that here in these tributes in this House we assess the whole life of a man of great distinction, and that assessment must produce the conclusion that Harold Macmillan's honourable place in history was secured by the humanity, the breadth of vision and the courage that were his persistent attributes: attributes, indeed, made all the greater because they were continuously applied throughout his lifetime, both as rebel and as ruler. They were the qualities which enabled the product of imperial privilege to become the great decoloniser; the rich man to become the caustic critic of the causes and the results of poverty; the opponent of Communism to become the communicator with the Soviet Union and an architect of the test ban treaty; the angry young man to become, on his elevation to the House of Lords, the astringent old man.

Lord Stockton's bitter experience of the first world war and the ghosts of what Siegfried Sassoon called the "unreturning army that was youth" haunted him throughout his life. It produced a combination of values which, to his eternal credit, made Harold Macmillan an insistent supporter of a new system of international economic and social order as the alternative to war, and at the very same time such a remorseless opponent of the appeasement of Hitler and Mussolini as to take him into the Labour party Lobby and temporarily away from the Conservative Whip in the confidence motion of June 1936.

Harold Macmillan was obviously steadfast for causes, but for all his commitment, he was, of course, no romantic. He distrusted doctrine. Although he was a man of profound beliefs, he never let them slip into self-righteousness. Indeed, he embodied the great difference between ideals and dogma. He was, throughout his life, continual proof of the distinction that separates the real champion of conviction from the mere purveyor of prejudice.

Despite those virtues—indeed, possibly because of those virtues—Harold Macmillan was not a saintly or a sainted man. His droll dismissive humour, the way in which he turned Edwardian affectation into a wily weapon of politics, his long life in which he made enemies of friends as well as friends of enemies, and his capacity for what even one of his most admiring biographers has called hard ambition and even ruthlessness—all these human favours and frailties prevent any form of canonisation. And, as the Earl of Stockton himself might have said, just as well, too.

In that Macmillanite spirit of kindly candour, I say that death and distance cannot lend sufficient enchantment to alter the view that the period over which Harold Macmillan presided in the 1950s, while certainly and thankfully a period of rising affluence and confidence, was also a time of opportunities missed and of changes avoided. Harold Macmillan was not, of course, solely or even pre-eminently responsible for that, but we cannot but record with frustration the fact that the vigorous and perceptive attacker of the status quo in the 1930s became its emblem for a time in the 1950s, before returning to be its antagonist again in the 1980s.

However, none of that can change the history of a man who, from the furthest and most isolated Back Bench to the foremost high office, was, as the Prime Minister has said, concerned throughout his life with the condition of all of the people. Clearly, from that arose his insistence that one of the main objects of economic policy must be the pursuit of full employment. We pay tribute to him for continuing always to march under those colours. As from the 1930s to the 1960s he advocated and—in many ways, more important—administered for full employment, so in recent times in his speeches in the House of Lords he restated the case made 50 years before for positive policies and action to take proper advantage of the possibilities of the revolutions in technology.

In the words of his "The Middle Way" Harold Macmillan believed:

"The important thing is that society should be organised in such a way as to bring the economic system under conscious direction and control and that the increased production should be directed towards raising the standard of comfort and security of all of the people."

In his last speech on affairs before the Munich crisis in 1938 he drew attention to the devastating effects of social division. In probably one of the most brilliant and moving of the many contributions that he made in the House he said:

"in these home problems, it is not a question of mere geographical distance, but of the wide chasm made by the lack of imagination on the part of a portion of the people who have never been able really to have brought home to them . . . the problems that confront large masses of our fellow-countrymen. Those of us who attended Church last Sunday will have heard read, in the Gospel for the day, the . . . words of the parable of the Dives and Lazareth—terrifying words— . . . 'Between us and you there is a great gulf fixed.'."

He went on to speak of what he called

"That great imaginative gulf, that incapacity to bring home to people the true realities of what is going on in this country in the 20th century."

He defined that as one of the central problems confronting the Government of the day.

The fervent enemy of appeasement concluded that speech with an assertion that showed both boldness and sagacity in that context and presented a continuing challenge to politicians of all times. He said:

"The House of Commons is pressing . . . the Government day by day to a solution of the problems of rearmament and the dangers that may face us from foreign invasion. I wish the House would show the same enthusiasm to solve the problems of protecting the people against the insecurities of peace." —[Official Report, 24 June 1938; Vol. 337, c. 1439-40.]

I quote from that speech, for it appears to me that it crystallises so much of what Harold Macmillan sought to stand for throughout his life: the closing of gulfs in the standards of living, and understanding between areas, classes, systems and countries. Not, for him, an invertebrate consensus, but the toughest and most central demand of democratic politics.

Throughout his life Harold Macmillan worked and spoke in the knowledge that from the village, to the nation, to the global community, the great task of us all is to ensure, in his words, that

"the machines which enable men to conquer scarcity" never become those that

"plunge him deeper into poverty" or indeed into conflict.

That is the man to whom we pay tribute: one who believed and sought to show by active application that the great purpose of intellect, the imagination of which he spoke, was to use intelligence and strength for the humane and productive solution of practical problems. For that service, and the effort which throughout his lifetime he put into trying to meet his duties, we honour him without restraint.

3.50 pm

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Each of our political movements has lost, during the recess, colleagues whom we will always remember with affection and whose contributions to parliamentary democracy we will sorely miss.

On behalf of the Liberal party I join the other leaders in paying tribute today to Harold Macmillan. Interestingly, in his younger years he was greatly influenced by the then Liberal leader, David Lloyd George, as could be seen from his involvement with Liberals in the organisation known as Political and Economic Planning, in the contents of "The Next Five Years" in 1935 and in "The Middle Way" in 1938.

That early experience did not, during his later period as Prime Minister and leader of the Conservative party, cause him to take a kindly view of the Liberal party. One of Harold Macmillan's characteristics was a maliciously effective sense of humour, and in 1961, in a vain attempt to stem the Orpington tide, he declared:

"As usual the Liberals offer a mixture of sound and original ideas. Unfortunately, none of the sound ideas is original and none of the original ideas is sound."

The mutual antipathy between the Liberals and Harold Macmillan's party in the 1960s in no way diminishes our respect for his very considerable achievments. His deep concern for housing and employment, stemming from his early years as the hon. Member for Stockton, his restoration of Anglo-American relations after the disaster of Suez, his conduct of the transition to independence in Africa, and especially his unheeded warnings in South Africa of the wind of change, his steps towards European unity and his constructive dialogue with Moscow, which helped to secure the nuclear test ban treaty, mean that he will be remembered and appreciated beyond party boundaries.

Like most hon. Members now, I never served with Harold Macmillan in the House and my only personal recollections are of occasional meetings outside Parliament: that shuffling gait, the deliberately hesitant, pausing manner, the myopic glance at the notes, all leading to entertaining, moving and highly effective speeches. There can be few of us who can hope to make, beyond the age of 90, such major contributions to the nation's debates. His was a truly remarkable career, and we warmly salute it.

3.53 pm

Mr. Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the Leaders of the Labour and Liberal parties have eloquently described the life and work of Harold Macmillan. It will be for history eventually to form a judgment of his policies and achievements, although already the rather superficial judgments that were made shortly after his resignation are, 20 years later, being revised.

I should like to add my tribute, both as one who served him as Chief Whip throughout his first Administration and as a colleague in his Cabinet throughout the second, and as a colleague and a friend. I think that we would want to pay tribute to Harold Macmillan from the point of view that we all have in common, which is that of a parliamentarian. It was Parliament, and especially the House of Commons, which was the main interest in his life for more than 60 years. That was so from the time shortly after the end of the first world war when he came into the House as the Member for Stockton. I do not think that anyone ever knew the House more intimately than he did. After all, he was on the Back Benches for 14 years before he received his first appointment as a Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State. That gave him every opportunity of getting to know the attitudes and changing currents with which we are familiar. For him, the Smoke Room was one of the most likeable clubs of those to which he belonged. Throughout his time, especially while Prime Minister, he never ceased to be there in the evenings at a time when the Smoke Room was used a great deal by all hon. Members and to keep in touch with them.

Harold Macmillan believed very much in working with the House in order to achieve his own purposes. As one or two here know, he did not find it easy to address the House and to try to influence it. To begin with, he found television a horrifying venture, and he was never really happy with the impersonality of radio. It was only later, on the great occasions, that he felt at home addressing conferences. It was very late in his life when he began to establish the reputation which he now has of a television performer. All these arts had to be developed, and he did so by getting to know the House better and better.

As Chief Whip, I remember reporting to Harold Macmillan as usual at 10 o'clock in the morning about events in the House the night before and the troubles over an amendment, about which discussion had still not ceased. He said, "Ask the Minister just to let this go. It will not be the end of the world if we accept the amendment." I was looking rather blank, when he said, "Well, yes, tell him, you know, that often you please an awful lot of people if you give them what they want." That is not always the sort of thing that a Chief Whip likes to hear, but when it comes it is wise advice.

Harold Macmillan had an innate sense of history as well as the experience of all his years in politics. This enabled him to put every contemporary problem into a historical context. He had a creative mind which enabled him to find a solution to so many of the contemporary problems with which he had to deal. That was how he came to handle the economic problems of his time, how he foresaw the era of the great powers, how he recognised that the days of colonial powers were over and how he saw that our future lay in Europe. That was how he came to handle the innumerable problems of those years and to deal with them as a member of the Cabinet and as Prime Minister. If he had been asked, "How would you most like to be remembered?", he would have said, "As a House of Commons man."

3.58 pm

Mr. James Callaghan (Cardiff, South and Penarth): It is customary on these occasions for the Father of the House to say some words supposedly on behalf of all Back Benchers, but I do not presume to do that on this occasion. I wish, however, to add a short tribute.

I first heard Harold Macmillan speak in 1936 at a conference of trade unions. I listened to him say—it was his constant theme thereafter—that we should deal with unemployment and that there was no moral case for sitting back and allowing the market to take charge of our lives. That was a theme which he pursued throughout his life. He was still saying the same thing 50 years later, and saying it with the sincerity that he had displayed in 1936.

The Prime Minister referred to the wind of change speech. I have thought more than once about why he made it, and perhaps in some ways it can be traced back to his own history and that of his firm. Macmillan, the publisher, established its firm in India more than 100 years ago.

It is not always remembered that Harold Macmillan had a special interest in and concern about India. Indeed, when there were some divisions in the Conservative party in 1947 during the Second Reading debate on the Indian Independence Bill, Harold Macmillan on behalf of the Conservative party, which was then in Opposition, expressed support for India's independence. I have sometimes thought of his close connection with India. He returned to India more than once and was delighted when he was made a patron of the Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan. That honour may have led him to think about Africa and to make his wind of change speech there some 20 years later, perhaps inspired by what he knew of and believed and cared about in India.

Others have referred to all Harold Macmillan's achievements. I do not intend to do that. I do not think that he would have wanted this to be an occasion of mourning. He had too much, as has been said, of an impish sense of humour for that. The other day, the right hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery) reminded me of a hilarious evening when he telephoned me and asked to have dinner with Harold Macmillan because he wanted somebody to gossip to him. The jokes that we heard—I dare not tell some of them!

I recall an occasion when the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) was present, together with Lord Wilson, Lord Home and myself. Harold Macmillan was due to address an audience. He said that he wondered what was the proper collective noun for a group of former Prime Ministers. After all, every group has its own collective noun—a flock of sheep, a herd of cows, a pride of lions. After a typical pause, he said, "Perhaps it should be a lack of principles."

The only other story that I wish to tell concerns an occasion on which he said to me, again in another enjoyable conversation, "Do you know, I think you and I ought to form the next Cabinet together." I said, "I think that that would be a good idea. I am sure that we could do better than the present lot." He said, "Yes, perhaps we could." Here I utter a word of advice to the Prime Minister. He went on to say, "But we cannot have too many young men in it. They will only try to push us out."

Harold Macmillan, with all his great talents, enjoyment and mastery of this House, would not have wanted us to be too solemn this afternoon. We celebrate his great achievements as a parliamentarian. He was a master parliamentarian in every way. He was a man of great sincerity. He had certain principles to which he stuck, whether they were popular or unpopular. As has been said, he was a man of the House of Commons. We should pay tribute to the fact that the House of Commons attracted men of his stature, and I believe that today it is continuing to attract men and women of similar stature to continue to continue in that way.

4.3 pm

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): We remember a remarkable man. We have heard from people who were hon. Members with Harold Macmillan and knew him for many years. For my generation of New Statesmen readers, brought up on a weekly Vicky cartoon, he was Supermac — a lovable old rogue. I remember his characteristics in that period as Prime Minister. He was the first Prime Minister to try to make Britain a member of the European Community, and the first Prime Minister to understand that we must rid ourselves of our colonial responsibilities in Africa. Perhaps also for a generation in which Suez was a dramatic event, it is wise to remember the man who was first in and first out.

I shall add no more than the words that he himself used in another place — words which we did not hear, but words upon which we could well reflect — in his remarkable speech in January 1985. He concluded by saying:

"It is for the next generation—it will not be for me but for my successors—to make the decision. Should we just slowly and majestically sink—not perhaps drastically or tragically, but go slowly down like a great ship—or shall we make a new determined and united effort, putting, as far as we can the party aside? There must be parties, of course, but there can be co-operation and even national governments. Let us do the latter and then historians of the future will not describe the ending of this century as the beginning of the decline and fall of Britain but as the beginning of the new and glorious renaissance."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 23 January 1985; Vol. 459, c 254.]

4.5 pm

Mr. Julian Amery (Brighton, Pavilion): The Macmillan family and its widespread connections are not as broadly represented in the House as they were when I first became an hon. Member. On behalf of the family, I hope that I may be allowed to express what I am sure is the appreciation of all of us for the generous tribute that has been paid this afternoon to the memory of Harold Macmillan. It would not be seemly for me to add to it. He was my friend before I joined his family. He taught me much of what I have learnt of the statecraft of Whitehall and Westminster. I know well that, beneath all the histrionics, he served two great goals all his life: the betterment of the condition of the people and the maintenance and possible extension of Britain's influence in the world. I am grateful to the House for letting me add my tribute to those that have already been paid.

4.6 pm

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I add my tribute to the memory of the Earl of Stockton from the citizens of that town, whom I now have the honour to represent in this place. I do so as a citizen of Stockton who, for the first five years of his life, had Harold Macmillan as his Member of Parliament, although I must say that the memory is not clear. I remember also my parents speaking about Harold Macmillan and, indeed—reference must be made to this—about Lady Dorothy, who took the hearts of the people of Stockton in a way that was reflected in Harold Macmillan's later life.

It is a testament to the affection and concern that Harold Macmillan learnt and showed in Stockton that he chose the Earldom for his title when he went to the other place. I am sure that the town of Stockton will remember him in the same way. The name will permanently be remembered and will remain part of his family. I have no doubt that many people in Stockton will suffer a great loss now that he has gone and is not carrying forward the flame that he picked up in Stockton—his compassion for the unemployed, which came through so strongly in his later life.

4.8 pm

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): I join my parliamentary colleagues, both friend and foe in political terms, in paying tribute to the life of public service dedicated by my predecessor as the hon. Member for Stockton. I did not have the privilege of meeting him personally, but I know very well many people, from all ranks and from all parties, who did. Without exception, they call him to mind with genuine warmth and with real affection. Even his most implacable political enemies from those days pay tribute to his commitment and to what the noble Lord Wilson of Rievaulx has described as his "dedicated professionalism". Lord Wilson also conferred upon him what he called "a profound sense of history." Such an observation was so aptly precise.

Although we all know how unkind a commentator history can be in looking back over the way in which we conduct our affairs, it was that very attribute — his profound sense of history—that enabled the noble Earl to pass such telling comment in recent times on measures being implemented nationally. The last year must have been bitterly ironic for the man who, 51 years before, had fought a general election on his own personal manifesto, calling for pubic control of transport and gas.

Indeed, some of my colleagues may be as surprised as I was to read of the Earl of Stockton's rebellious spirit and independent judgment, to learn of his single-minded approach to the choice of Division Lobby on certain issues, and to learn that it was he who, in his book "The Middle Way", written as early as 1928, described the stock exchange as "a casino"—a phrase used frequently by some of my hon. Friends even today, and almost shanghaied by the leader of a certain party over Christmas.

Harold Wilson, in his book "A Prime Minister on Prime Ministers", referred to Harold Macmillan as a Tory democrat, and asserted:

"Macmillan's Tory democracy was based on those he came to know and love in Stockton, the workers—and, in the years he represented Stockton, the unemployed."

If one compares the present with the past, little, in those specific terms, has changed, save that the lesson that I learn from those conditions of deprivation is a Socialist lesson. The common ground that remains is that of compassion and democracy.

The individual contribution of that one man to the world of politics, national and global, was quite prodigious, equalled by fewer than a handful of Britons in this century. Would that we were all able, regardless of party, to emulate his commitment, match his dedication and, above all, reflect his sensitivity and compassion.

4.11 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): As one of those who, as the Prime Minister put it, is a member of the small band of those who were in the House with Harold Macmillan, I should like to refer briefly to his kindness and thoughtfulness to all young Members of Parliament of all parties, not least to opponents. On 4 July 1963 I asked him "if he will ensure that legislation presented to this House is not drafted in obscure language."

Harold Macmillan replied:

"I have every sympathy with the hon. Member's objective. However, I am afraid that, in order to achieve precision in legislation which is complex and often technical, it is not always possible to avoid an impression of obscurity."

I then asked briefly:

"I accept the fact that the Parliamentary draftsmen must try to prevent those who would pretend to misunderstand from doing so, but is it not also important that we laity should understand legislation?"

This is a vintage and skilful Harold Macmillan reply:

"I know that this is a difficult problem. I would remind the House of the very wise words of Sir James Stephen, one of our greatest authorities, who pointed out that since legislation is often the subject of litigation it is absolutely necessary not only that it should appear to be simple to those who read it in good faith, but actually precise. That is a very difficult art. Many things are simple. Let us take the sentence: 'When John met his uncle in the street he took off his hat.' That is a clear sentence, but it is capable of at least six different meanings. The point about legislation is that the courts have to interpret it in litigation based upon it, and it is therefore essential that it should be not so much simple as precise." — [Official Report, 4 July 1963; Vol. 680, c 583-84.]

That was all, incidentally, in Prime Minister's Question Time.

The following week I heard an authoritative voice behind me in a Corridor in the House say, "Dalyell, come here." That was the Prime Minister. He said, "I was not unsympathetic towards your question, so I shall arrange for the chief parliamentary draftsman to show you exactly why I gave the answer that I did." I was a very junior Member of the House, and the following day Sir Noel Hutton appeared, on Prime Ministerial instruction. He was an extremely distinguished QC, and he came armed with endless volumes. I have not been taken apart like that since I was a first-year student—in the nicest way.

The point is that the Prime Minister should go to such trouble for a young opponent to whom he owed absolutely nothing and who had been an embarrassment to him in the West Lothian by-election before the night of the long knives, in which his party lost its deposit in our rolling countryside. It was an act of generosity that is not forgotten.

The Prime Minister referred to Dick Crossman. I was the latter's PPS. Crossman always said that when he was extremely ill Macmillan in North Africa made arrangements that saved his life. I am sure that there are many examples of the personal kindnesses of this man.

Power Plant Industry

4.15 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the further job losses in the power plant industry."

The matter is immediate because last Friday NEI Parsons declared a further 800 workers redundant. That brings to over 1,700 the total number of jobs that have been gone at NEI in the past year. The matter is urgent because NEI is a pillar of Tyneside's industrial base. It is the largest private sector employer in the county. The matter is also urgent because those redundancies were wholly avoidable, as are other redundancies in that industrial sector — I am thinking particularly of Babcock's just before Christmas.

The fault most certainly does not lie with the company —not with the owners, the investors, the managers or the work force. The company has fought a tremendous battle for overseas work. Production utilises the very latest technology and phase II of the company's investment programme involves £30 million of further investment. Industrial relations at the plant, involving a highly skilled work force, are good.

The problem is lack of orders. No domestic orders have been placed in the industrial sector since 1978. The leader in today's edition of Newcastle's The Journal is headed "800 victims of inertia". It states:

"Whenever hundreds of jobs are lost in a community—and it is not an exceptional occurrence in the North—there is bound to be disappointment, concern, an understandable degree of bitterness . . . What is beyond question, however, is that bitterness will turn to justifiable anger if it is felt that action could have been taken to save and secure jobs which have instead been unnecessarily sacrificed.

And this is surely the case with the 800 redundancies announced at the end of last week at NEI Parsons, which has been waiting for years for a domestic order for a coal-fired power station.

The Government is in a position to place such an order but has refused to do so".

That leader speaks for the whole of the north-east of England.

The Central Electricity Generating Board acknowledges the requirement for coal-fired power stations, yet the Secretary of State does nothing. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Merchant) lays the blame at the door of the Secretary of State for Energy, and he is right to do so.

The power supply industry must be maintained beyond the mid-1990s, and we should debate the Secretary of State's failure to do so.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the further job losses in the power plant industry."

I listened with care and sympathy to what the hon. Gentleman said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20 and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House. However, I hope that he will find other ways of raising the matter.

Ministerial Statements

4.18 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If Harold Macmillan were here today, he would be surprised, as large numbers of the British public must be, that no statement is being made on what arrangements the Government are making to stop many elderly people freezing to death and, secondly, that no statement is being made on the crash of the Army convoy over the weekend. Can you say, Mr. Speaker, whether the Government, at any stage, have said that they intend to make statements on those two important matters and, if not, have you expressed any concern on behalf of the House about the absence of such statements?

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I sympathise with you about your voice and hope that I will not cause you any difficulties. You will understand that we do not wish to have too many applications under Standing Order No. 20, so we should discipline ourselves accordingly. I deliberately did not table a Standing Order No. 20 application because I hoped that a statement would be made about the appalling difficulties being faced by many of our elderly people during this bitter winter weather. It is disgraceful that no statement is being made about whether the trigger arrangements will be implemented so that some elderly people on supplementary benefit may receive additional heating benefits.

I am aware that there is a question tabled for tomorrow, but that is no substitute for a statement from the Secretary of State because, at most, only three or four hon. Members will be able to ask supplementary questions to question No. 7 which is tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden). I hope that tomorrow such a statement will be made because the difficulties being experienced by many elderly people should preoccupy the House. It is disgraceful that there has been no statement today.

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall deal with one matter at a time. Regarding the matter raised by the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), as the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) said, the hon. Gentleman has question No. 7 on the Order Paper tomorrow. I am not responsible for any statements by the Government. On the question of the accident, it would be perfectly legitimate to raise this during tomorrow's debate on the Army. Again, I am not responsible for any statement.

Hon. Member for Workington (Allegations)

4.20 pm

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a point of order to seek your guidance following allegations made by the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) in a debate on the security services on 15 December. I would have raised the matter with you sooner, but for the fact that the hon. Gentleman made his attack initially under the cloak of anonymity and it was not until immediately after the rising of the House for the Recess that my name came to be publicly linked with his accusations. Therefore, I am availing myself of the first possible opportunity to draw this matter to your attention.

During a 56-minute speech the hon. Gentleman attacked various individuals, including the head of the Civil Service and my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General, impugning the honour and integrity of both. Among the targets of his attacks were two Conservative Members of Parliament whom he declined to name and who, he claimed, had engaged in a conspiracy with officers of MI5 to bring about the downfall of Her Majesty's Government by unconstitutional means during the second Administration of Lord Wilson of Rievaulx.

He said at column 783 that only one of the two hon. Members was still in the House and that he would approach that individual and ask him "to make a personal statement". Two days later I received a letter from the hon. Gentleman stating that Mr. Peter Wright had "identified" me—whatever that might mean—and calling on me to make a personal statement to the House.

The very next day a highly regarded member of the parliamentary press lobby informed me that he had been told by the hon. Gentleman himself that Sir Stephen Hastings and I had been sent letters by the hon. Gentleman, identifying us. I understand that the hon. Gentleman subsequently denied informing the press. However, by whatever process of telepathy the existence of his letters came to be communicated to the press—certainly neither Sir Stephen nor I did so—our names came by the weekend to be publicly linked with his most grave accusations.

Asserting that it was "the biggest political scandal of this century" and that it

"surpasses in importance the Zinoviev letter", the hon. Gentleman accused me, and our former and distinguished colleague, Sir Stephen Hastings, of being

"beyond the law" and

"involved in action against the Crown."

He alleged that, as part of a smear campaign designed to bring about the downfall of the Wilson Government, we acted as "conduits" for bogus information which we knew "came illegally from within MI5."

The hon. Gentleman further declared:

> "They did not stop it, nor did they report it to the Home Secretary. They just passed it on in the knowledge that it would destabilise the Labour Prime Minister and his Government."—[Official Report, 15 December 1986; Vol. 107, c. 783-4.]

The charge that the hon. Gentleman has levelled against us is, in effect, of engaging in a treasonable conspiracy to bring down Her Majesty's Government.

[Mr. Churchill]

Few graver charges can be made, especially against a Member of this honourable House. Indeed, it remains a capital offence for which, uniquely, the gallows are preserved to this day.

May I say that I have never at any time worked for or with MI5. Nor have I ever knowingly even met any individual from MI5. I have certainly never engaged in any conspiracy, treasonable or otherwise, with MI5 or with any of its officers, past or present. So far as they relate to me, the hon. Gentleman's accusations are a seamless tissue of falsehoods. Furthermore, Sir Stephen Hastings, with whom I have been in touch and who, like me, has issued writs for libel against The Observer and two of its correspondents, has asked me to state on his behalf that the charges against him are also without foundation.

In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I must ask you whether it is in order for an hon. Gentleman to make such accusations against a fellow hon. Member without producing any evidence to substantiate the charge. If you agree that that represents a flagrant abuse of the privileges of this House, I should be grateful if you would consider referring the hon. Gentleman's conduct to the Committee of Privileges. Finally, I challenge the hon. Gentleman either to repeat his accusations outside the protection of parliamentary privilege or to withdraw them unequivocally.

Mr. Speaker: As the House knows, the rule is that it is not in order to reflect in debate on the conduct of another hon. Member except on a substantive motion which admits of a distinct vote of the House. In the debate on 15 December, to which the hon. Gentleman has drawn attention, the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) reflected on the conduct of two other Members. If he had identified them, the Chair would have intervened to enforce that rule. He did not do so, so there was no basis on which the Chair could take action. Nor can I take action now. However, if the hon. Gentleman alleges that this is a matter of privilege, he should write to me in the usual way and I shall consider it.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I give you notice that I intend to take the opportunity of replying in full detail.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Ordered,

That the Trafford Park Development Corporation (Area and Constitution) Order 1986 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Malone.]

Orders of the Day

Local Government Finance Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I rise in respect of certain provisions in the Bill on which it is proposed to have a Second Reading debate in the House today. Clause 1 requires all local authorities to keep a rate fund revenue account, and the Inner London education authority is a local authority for that purpose. Will you, Mr. Speaker, consider treating the Bill as a hybrid Bill? Clause 7 provides for the maximum rate precept of each designated authority to be determined in accordance with schedule 2. If any hon. Members have had the opportunity to look at schedule 2, they will recognise, not only its complexity, but the need to have a considerable understanding of algebra to make any sense of it.

Within designated authorities, subparagraphs 2(1) and (2) of the schedule include what is called a "T" factor, calculated in accordance with paragraphs 3(6) and 4 of schedule 2 which is intended to pick up the effects of the teachers' pay settlement. The formula for designated authorities in sub-paragraphs 2(3) to 2(6) of schedule 2 exclude that T factor.

Sub-paragraphs 2(1), 2(2) and 2(6) relate to types of local authorities which are, or may be, local education authorities. Within the category of local authorities which are designated authorities, the Inner London education authority is the only one with the functions of a local education authority which does not have the T factor applied to it. It is, therefore, arguable in terms of hybridity that among that category, the ILEA's financial interests —and therefore the financial interests of Inner London ratepayers—are treated differently from the interests of all other local authorities and their ratepayers. That could accordingly be argued to come within the definition of a hybrid Bill, as given in "Erskine May", as:

"a public Bill which affects a particular private interest in a manner different from the private interests of other persons or bodies of the same category or class."

In the argument on a similar point relating to what is now the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984, you held, Mr. Speaker, that there was no hybridity as the category of constituent authorities — the London boroughs—were a genuine class, and the fact that the City of London was not within that class did not alter the position. In the present case, however, the definition of ILEA as a local authority for the principal purposes of the Bill — remedying the rate support grant position — distinguishes it from the City under the 1984 Act.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is a prima facie case for saying that this is a hybrid Bill. I ask you to consider this submission most carefully in view of its complexity. To save any risk of further damaging your vocal chords, perhaps your could let the House know your decision in due course.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to make a point related to hybridity. I apologise for the lack of notice, but, as you will appreciate, the Bill was published only the day before the House went into recess, and its effects have been difficult to determine, even for those expert in this complex area.

The essence of private legislation, as I understand it, is that there is within any enactment or proposed enactment an injurious affection of a technical, private interest exercised in an arbitrary manner within a single statutory classification in that legislation. If such injurious affection can be shown to exist, such legislation may come—I emphasise "may come" — within the ambit of the Standing Orders for private business in this House, and if it is a public Bill, it is therefore declared hybrid, being subject to both sets of Standing Orders.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said, schedule 2 contains a number of complex mathematical formulae which seek to define classes of local authority. I quote the ruling of Mr. Speaker Hylton-Foster in 1963—a predecessor of yours, Mr. Speaker—from the current edition of "Erskine May", on page 896. He said:

"I think that a hybrid bill can be defined as a public bill which affects a particular private interest in a manner different from the private interests of other persons or bodies of the same category or class."

Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland, I am concerned that in the case of a borough the application of this formula may result in a very different injurious affection on both the borough and its inhabitants than on those to which that formula refers. You will know, Mr. Speaker, that in this respect, a borough corporate can be regarded as a private corporation just as any ratepayer in the borough can be regarded as a private individual.

The submission I make, therefore, is that if it can be shown that within any one of these classes of formulae the effect on any such borough, any of the burgesses or ratepayers, would be injurious, as distinct from the effect of other classes, the Bill should be regarded as subject to the Standing Orders for private business and, therefore, hybrid.

I do not necessarily expect a reply now. However, that is the position with which we are faced because of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker: I can deal with the matter despite my vocal chords, if the House will bear with me. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) for having given me notice of his point of order, and also to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), because I understand that he was making inquiries about this last week. That has given me an opportunity to look very carefully into the question of hybridity. I and my predecessors have frequently ruled that a Bill that concerns a matter of public policy and deals with private or local interests as members of a class without singling out any one of a class for adverse treatment is not hybrid.

The hon. Members for Newham, South and for Copeland both argue that because ILEA is dealt with separately from other authorities, the Bill is prima facie hybrid. I must tell them, however, that the Inner London education authority has, since its inception as the governing body for education in the inner boroughs of London, been treated as a class of its own in the metropolis. That was the case both in the London Government Act 1963 and in the Local Government Bill of 1984. I must, therefore, rule that dealing with ILEA separately does not render the Bill hybrid.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall call the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam), but I have nothing to add to my statement.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): On a different point of order, Mr. Speaker. I apologise for not giving you notice, but I could not do so until I discovered that a money resolution was attached to the Bill. Part II, which deals with its financial effects, states:

"It is not envisaged that there will be any significant increase in the amount available for grants."

I have gone through the Bill, but I cannot find any clause in italics. In other words, I cannot find any financial clause, yet a money resolution is attached to the Bill. The Bill was not properly presented to the House, as it appeared that it had no financial effects. Yet today we find that, in fact, financial effects are covered by a money resolution which we must debate later this evening.

Given the way in which the Bill has been presented and the fact that it has financial effects—or there would not be a money resolution—I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Bill has not been properly presented. The Government must consider what they are trying to do in presenting such a Bill. The House must decide how to consider the Bill, because it clearly has financial aspects.

"Erskine May" is quite clear that if a Bill has financial aspects, the clauses which relate to the financial aspects must be printed in italics. As they have not been printed in italics in the Bill, I submit that the Bill has not been properly presented to the House.

Mr. Speaker: On page 10, in part III, clause 16, the Bill states in italics:

"There shall be paid out of money provided by Parliament any increase attributable to this Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other Act."

A money resolution means, not that more money will be spent, but that it will be spent under a new authority. The matter is quite in order.

Dr. Cunningham: I accept what you have said, Mr. Speaker, about ILEA being a unique authority. It is the only single-purpose authority of its kind. I also accept what you have said about the 1962 and the 1984 Acts. However, my point is different. My point is that, for the purposes of today's Bill, ILEA is taken in a class with other authorities with educational functions. They are given consideration on the basis of the T factor that I mentioned in working out the implications of the Bill for them, but ILEA is not. Therefore, within the terms of the Bill, ILEA is treated differently from the other authorities in the same class in the Bill. That is the point at issue, and it is not a question of the treatment of ILEA, as in the previous cases that I have mentioned.

Mr. Speaker: I assure the hon. Gentleman that I have looked at this with the greatest of care, as the House would expect me to do when a question of hybridity is likely to be raised. I am satisfied that the Bill is not hybrid, for the reasons that I have stated.

Mr. Spearing: I apologise for returning to this matter, Mr. Speaker. We are subject to time constraints, and I have already apologised to you for not having been able to raise the point by notice. My point of order was not that raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). It was a new and a fresh point of order, and when you replied to him with the ruling that you have just reiterated, I hope that you were not attempting to include my point of order, which I hope can be dealt with as a separate issue, in an informal or formal manner, as you so please.

Mr. Speaker: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. He was dealing with the formula under which local authorities are rate-capped and how it may affect this authority. In view of the difficulty that I am facing today, I shall write to the hon. Gentleman about this matter.

Mr. McWilliam: Further to my point of order, Mr. Speaker. You drew my attention to page 10, which I had read. It says:

"There shall be paid out of money provided by Parliament any increase attributable to this Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other Act".

"Erskine May" is clear that the financial aspects of any Bill should relate to that Bill and not to any other Act. It is with that point that I find the greatest difficulty. The general financial clause seems to say that money for the Bill can come out of any other aspects of Supply to which the House has already agreed. This seems not to be in order with the general way in which we deal with financial procedures and does not, in a reasonable manner, relate to the way in which we should deal with legislation that concerns finance.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman raises a technical point. As far as I can see this is in order, but in view of what he has said I shall look carefully at the matter before we come to the money resolution.

4.33 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

As the House knows, the purpose of the Bill is to validate the practice that my Department and the Welsh Office have both adopted since 1981-82, in line with the wishes of local government, in calculating relevant and total expenditure for block grant and rate limitation, to allow that practice to continue on a proper basis for the remaining years of the present system; and to set rate and precept limits for 1987-88. It deals also with a much lesser problem in Scotland. I explained the background in my statement on 16 December. The House may find it helpful if I expand a little on what I said then, before describing briefly the provisions of the Bill.

I shall begin by explaining the concepts of relevant and total expenditure. "Relevant expenditure" is essentially the net expenditure of local authorities after netting off income such as fees and charges. The Secretary of State must take this into account in determining the total amount of grant which should go to local authorities each year. "Total expenditure" is a narrower concept. It is broadly relevant expenditure less specific and supplementary grants. An authority's total expenditure is the total which is eligible for block grant. Neither relevant nor total expenditure is a measure of gross spending.

Total expenditure is taken into account in determining grant related poundages, multipliers, and, perhaps most important the individual entitlements to grants of local authorities. Total expenditure also has an important role in rate limitation. I select authorities for rate limitation if in my view their total expenditure is excessive. The expenditure levels that I determine are levels of total expenditure, and I calculate rate limits from these.

Before taking the House through the history of events, I should also say something about local authority funds and accounts. Every local authority is required to keep a general rate fund or its equivalent, into which receipts are paid and from which liabilities are discharged. Each will maintain, though not required to by statute, an account of its main revenue transactions, often called a rate fund revenue account. Depending on the nature of the authority, it will have a number of other named funds or accounts, some required by statute, some not — for instance, the housing revenue account, the direct labour organisation revenue account, the superannuation fund, the loans fund, special funds, including capital funds set up under the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1976, and trading accounts. This Bill stems from the relationship of the general rate fund—what is usually called the rate fund revenue account—to these and other funds and accounts.

The central issue is whether the rate fund for the purposes of calculating relevant and total expenditure should be interpreted in the wide sense of treating all other funds and accounts, such as special funds, the housing revenue account, and accounts of trading undertakings merely as sub-divisions of the rate fund, or in the narrow sense of seeing the rate fund as a separate and distinct entity from these other funds and accounts. Under the wide interpretation, expenditure falling to be defrayed from the rate fund is the entire expenditure of the authority but does not include internal contributions between funds and accounts. Under the narrow interpretation of the rate fund, its expenditure excludes expenditure charged direct to the other funds and accounts, but includes contributions to those funds and accounts. Since the beginning of the present grant system, my Department and the Welsh Office have adopted the narrow interpretation in line with the wishes of local government.

What happened was as follows: from late 1979 the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980, which established block grant, was passing through Parliament. The Act defines relevant and total expenditure, on which block grant is paid, essentially as expenditure falling to be defrayed from the rate fund. It was only after the Act was passed, and after the first block grant settlement had been made in December 1980, that the issue emerged clearly. This was when draft grant claim forms were sent to the local authority associations which made it clear that the Department envisaged using the wide interpretation for calculating authorities' entitlements.

The local authority associations were very concerned about the proposal to interpret references to the rate fund in the 1980 Act in this way. They argued that the narrow view of the rate fund was an equally possible interpretation of the Act and that the wide view was not consistent with accepted and sensible accounting practices.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): The Conservative-controlled associations were particularly vociferous in making this point. It was also welcomed by Department of the Environment Ministers. They hoped to encourage housing revenue account profits which the Government had made legal by the 1980 Act.

Mr. Ridley: I am speaking from memory, but I believe that all the local authority associations preferred the narrow rather than the wide interpretation. The only exception was the London borough of Wandsworth, which at that time was led by my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope). He believed that it would have been better at that time, or at a later stage, to use the other definition. I cannot comment on the hon. Gentleman's second point. I was not in the Department at that time. However, I have more to tell him about what happened.

In considering the issue, Ministers had at that time to weigh the two differing interpretations of the 1980 Act references to the rate fund and the disruption to local authorities' accounting practices which would have stemmed from a decision to proceed with a wide view of the rate fund. The Government therefore decided to accept the strongly argued and unanimous views—this is the answer to the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts)—of the local authority associations and adopt a narrow definition for calculating grant entitlements under the 1981-82 rate support grant settlement, thus continuing what had been existing practice for many years under earlier legislation. A circular letter to this effect was sent to local authorities on 13 February 1981. No queries were raised and the approach taken was generally welcomed.

The change in 1981-82 to the local authority approach to the rate fund was made on the basis that for 1982-83 the issue would be reconsidered with the associations.

A paper was put to the local authority associations in April 1981. Given the unanimous acceptance of the interpretation adopted for 1981-82, this proposed that the local authority approach to total expenditure should be continued for 1982-83 and suggested a study to look at the pros and cons of changing to the wider approach in the longer term. The local authority associations continued, however, to press strongly the view that there should be no switch to the wide approach and that there was no need for any study to look at this alternative approach. The Department agreed to put the issue on one side but indicated that "they might come back to the group with proposals in future if they seemed necessary".

From then on, the Government operated the block grant system on the basis of the narrow view of the rate fund. During that period there were a number of legal challenges, brought on a variety of grounds, to the Secretary of State's decisions on rate support grant and rate limitation. But in those proceedings no legal point was taken against the narrow view, nor did local government auditors question the practice.

The issue re-emerged last year when it was discovered that a number of returns of expenditure from local authorities did not conform to normal practice on expenditure. Several authorities had decided to show contributions to special funds, even though they appeared to have a deficit on the rate fund revenue account and there was apparently no liability for which the money was being set aside. Another authority had decided that in 1984-85 transfers from a special fund should not count as income-reducing expenditure even though, in a previous year, it had counted transfers to special funds as expenditure. This was directly contrary to the approach which the Government had taken in 1981 at the request of the local authority associations.

It appeared that these devices were designed to increase block grant entitlement at the expense of other authorities. We estimate that the authorities concerned could gain a total of £38 million in grant because of them.

Although the practices had been accepted by the auditors in a number of cases, my Department was very doubtful whether it could accept them as a basis for paying grant. One set of authorities appeared in effect to be conjuring money for special funds out of the air solely to increase their grant entitlements. The approach of the other authority ran completely counter to normal practice. If accepted, it would have meant that the Government tolerated two completely opposite practices on the question of calculating total expenditure. That, clearly, was not on. I should say here that my Department has written to the authorities concerned seeking an explanation of the figures that they have submitted.

In September, in deciding how to respond to these cases, I looked closely at the definitions of relevant and total expenditure. I was concerned that the accepted practice did not correspond to the statute. I decided that it was essential to seek the Attorney-General's view. He supported counsel's opinion that the treatment of total expenditure which the Government had operated at the request of the local authority associations was indeed incorrect in law. Transfers between funds and accounts within the rate fund were not expenditure. Expenditure took place only when an authority had liabilities in the outside world and met these from the general rate fund. Any fund or account, whether statutory or non-statutory, which a council set up was simply a part of the rate fund earmarked for a particular purpose. I received the advice of the Attorney-General in later October and the Government decided to take urgent action.

As I have explained, the Government had originally responded positively and constructively to the strongly held views of the local authority associations on the interpretation of expenditure, but, in view of the cases which emerged last year and of the further legal advice, the Government had no alternative but to legislate. Without such legislation, all past decisions which involved the concepts of total or relevant expenditure would have been in doubt. It would have been quite improper to take further decisions about rate support or rate limitation without securing the legal position. I came to the House in December as soon as I was able to present the Government's fully worked up proposals for handling the problem. It would have been quite irresponsible to come without such a solution and face local government with the great uncertainty that that would have caused.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): The Secretary of State said that he came to the House at the earliest possible moment. On 3 December, some weeks after he knew about the problem, he made his third rate support grant statement to the House, although he knew that the basis upon which it was assessed was open to doubt under the system which he intended to tell us about on 16 December.

Mr. Ridley: That third consultative paper was intended for discussions with the local authorities. I have not made a decision about next year's rate support grant, although I hope to make a statement very soon on that subject. No rate support grant settlement is legal until it has been approved by the House. I shall be unable to invite the House to approve the rate support grant settlement until this Bill has become an Act. The House might like to remember that without the Bill becoming an Act, it will be impossible to pay grant for 1987-88.

[Mr. Ridley]

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): No Conservative Member blames my right hon. Friend for the problems with which he is faced. It was his misfortune to be sitting in the chair and holding the parcel when the music stopped. As the Bill effectively tries to maintain the status quo, will my right hon. Friend consider introducing either an amendment or a new clause to stop the present ratchet effect, which reduces the rate support grant for counties such as Hertfordshire? If it were introduced for 1988-89, it could continue until the new Conservative Government were able to produce their new rate reforms after the next general election.

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I should be even more grateful if he would not seek to add to the Bill, which is already complex enough, something that is of a completely different nature, which would freeze the present pattern of grants for 1988-89 and thereafter. I agree with my hon. Friend that it will be a blessing and a godsend when the new Green Paper proposals are implemented by an Act of Parliament. In the meantime, it will become increasingly difficult to operate the present system. This is neither the time nor the place to deal with that, although the suggestion of some sort of freezing of the system is not totally unattractive.

Dr. Cunningham: Will the Secretary of State be absolutely precise and tell the House when he was first advised of this state of affairs? We want to be told, not when the Attorney-General confirmed it, but when the Secretary of State was first advised of the illegality of the Government's position.

Mr. Ridley: I think I told the hon. Gentleman that I first became aware of the problem in September.

Dr. Cunningham: When?

Mr. Ridley: Without consulting my files I cannot give the precise date in September, but let me make it clear that this was brought as a possible problem upon which it would be correct to seek legal advice. We sought legal advice from counsel and then had to seek a second opinion, and I consulted my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General. It was not until we were certain about the legal position that I realised the problem would have to be dealt with.

The main purpose of the Bill is to allow my Department and the Welsh Office to continue with the practice adopted to date, and supported by the general body of local government, for calculating relevant and total expenditure. The Bill will enable transfers to and from this account to be defined in a way which replicates current practice on expenditure; that is, that total expenditure should be the net expenditure of the rate fund revenue account.

Clause 1 and schedule 1 require authorities to keep a rate fund revenue account and list those accounts separate from it. Clause 2 sets out the practices to be observed in compiling the account. Clause 3 defines relevant and total expenditure in relation to the rate fund revenue account. These clauses apply from the financial year 1987-88 onwards. Clause 4 validates all things done for rate support grant purposes since 1981. There are, however, further decisions on rate support grant to be taken for all years since 1981-82. Clauses 4 and 5 provide for these.

For 1981-82 and 1982-83, only the conclusive calculation of block grant remains to close the books. The Bill provides that these calculations shall be done on the basis of the figures in the last supplementary reports made for those years. For the years 1983-84 to 1986-87, there are outstanding supplementary reports to be made. The Bill provides that these shall be made on the same basis as reports for the years 1987-88 onwards. As I have explained, authorities have in practice kept what is usually called a rate fund revenue account. Clearly, it is not possible retrospectively to require authorities to keep rate fund revenue accounts. Therefore, the calculations will be based on the notional existence of such an account.

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): I think my right hon. Friend will agree that clause 5 is a little obscure and as a consequence seems to be open to a variety of interpretations, one of which is giving rise to fears that the basis of rate support grant from 1984-85 on may be changed to the disadvantage of local authorities. Those authorities will not know that until 1987, with the consequence that the whole of their calculations, not only for 1987-88, but for earlier years, might be adversely affected and ultimately ratepayers might be disadvantaged. Can my right hon. Friend confirm that it is not his intention to act retrospectively to the disadvantage of local authorities and ratepayers? If he can confirm that, and if it is possible to devise amendments for the Committee stage, will he agree to accept them?

Mr. Ridley: I can confidently confirm that no change whatever is proposed in the way in which past years will be treated for rate grant support settlements. The only point is that they must be based on what is in the Bill about the state of the definition, because hitherto the definition on which they were based was illegal. The Bill merely confirms the definition on which previous rate support grant settlements have been struck.

Dr. Cunningham: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ridley: I am replying to the point raised by my hon. Friend. Let me make it clear that the only effect of the Bill is that we will not be able to present to the House those final and other statements for the years in question until the Bill becomes an Act.

Dr. Cunningham: What the Secretary of State says cannot be true. There are retrospective provisions in the Bill. He must recognise that and must know that the Bill gives powers enabling him to invalidate decisions which may have been taken by local authorities and which may have been confirmed by the auditors. What he says about there being no retrospection is not true.

Mr. Ridley: I do not accept that for one moment. No change whatever is proposed to the way in which total expenditure definitions are calculated. We would not have paid grant on the devices that I have explained to the House. Despite what an auditor may have said, if we understood exactly what the local authorities were doing.

we would not have paid grant on those claims. Therefore, there is no change whatever, because we will not pay grant on them under the Act.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): The Secretary of State says that there will be no retrospective change. Will he confirm that he has already told Birmingham city council that it will lose £8 million because the Bill will change the basis on which the grant was calculated in previous years?

Mr. Ridley: No, that is not right. If I understand the matter correctly—and I think I do, but I want to put in a caveat in case we do not have the whole picture—Birmingham council moved a sum of money which it did not have into a special fund, and at a later stage it moved that money back into the rate fund, thereby claiming grant. Even the hon. Gentleman will agree that that is not quite right, because it is taking money from other authorities by reducing the grant which those other authorities would have received. If that is what happened in Birmingham, clearly it would not have been acceptable to the Government and the practice would not have resulted in my Department paying grant to Birmingham. The effect of the Bill will be to leave Birmingham in exactly the same position.

I shall now turn to rate and precept limitation. Because of the need to pass the Bill, we are unable to proceed with rate and precept limitation to the normal Rates Act timetable. The Bill therefore provides for rate and precept limits for designated authorities to be determined in accordance with a formula for each class of authority. The formulae contain broadly the same factors as are necessary to calculate rate and precept limits under normal procedures and reflect, as far as is possible, the decisions which we would have taken under those procedures.

Dr. Cunningham: The Secretary of State is dealing with the important matters of rate limitation and expenditure limits. Expenditure limits were set in July and some councils sought redeterminations. The results would normally have been announced in December and would have been based on the merits of individual cases. Because of the fiasco that the Government have created for themselves, and presumably to avoid charges of hybridity, it now appears that the Secretary of State is proposing to treat local authority cases not on their individual merits, but by class. That is grotesquely unfair, especially to boroughs such as Newham. Will he confirm that paragraph 3(2) of schedule 2 would enable him to set new expenditure limits before the Bill is passed and thus give authorities much fairer treatment?

Mr. Ridley: I do not have the time, in response to an intervention, to study the portion of the Bill that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned. We listened to all those authorities which applied for redetermination and took account of what they said. About half the local authorities applied and the result of those representations is accurately, although not totally accurately, reflected in the schedule showing the formula which we decided would cover the case. The alternative of allowing the Bill to become law and then go through the rest of the rate limitation procedure under the Rates Act would have taken us well past midsummer before the last rates limitation could be effected. That would have been intolerable for the authorities because they would have had no certainty at all.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West) rose—

Mr. Ridley: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, but that will be the last time that I do so, as I must allow other hon. Members to join the debate.

Mr. Banks: The three hon. Members representing Newham constituencies went to see the Minister to support the council's case for redetermination. Is the Secretary of State saying that the Bill incorporates our individual application for redetermination? Frankly, that is not the case. Authorities are treated in terms of a class. Even boroughs which did not apply for redetermination have been given a 2 per cent. increase in their expenditure levels. Therefore, they have been treated as a class and not individually. However courteous the Minister's treatment of us, we wasted our time in seeing him.

Mr. Ridley: If a borough or a district does not wish to increase its rates by the amount allowed for in the Bill, it does not have to do so. Some authorities which did not apply for redetermination have been given a 2 per cent. increase. They can leave their rate 2 per cent. lower than the level in the Bill.

Newham has the highest rates of any London borough. Its 1986-87 budget was 18 per cent. over GRE and is 15 per cent. up on the 1985-86 budget. Therefore, it is the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues, not the Government, who have a case to answer.

In setting the formulae, we took into account all the information that we had about designated authorities, including in particular that from redetermination applications and the meetings about them.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I hope to make a statement tomorrow about rate support grant for 1987-88. My colleagues and I will then inform authorities of the rate and precept limits for each authority that will result from the formulae. Authorities will, therefore, be fully aware of these when they come to issue precepts and set rates—even if the Bill is not yet enacted.

Clause 6 validates past decisions and actions on rate and precept limitation. Clauses 7 and 8 and schedule 2 set out the formulae which will produce the rate and precept limits and provide for the implementation of those limits. In particular, clause 8 provides that where an authority has fixed a rate or precept higher than its limit before the passing of the Act, it becomes invalid thereafter and it should substitute a lower one. Under the normal Rates Act procedures, rates and precepts fixed above the limits set by the Secretary of State are similarly invalid.

This legislation is urgent to enable the House to complete the rate support grant settlement for 1987-88 and to make outstanding supplementary reports from previous years and to complete the 1987-88 round of rate limitation. It is essential that we put matters right as fast as possible to end uncertainty about grant entitlements for 1987-88 and allow authorities to plan their budgets and rates. That is why we are asking Parliament to consider this legislation on an urgent timetable.

Supplementary provisions in clauses 10 and 11 will allow myself and the Secretary of State for Wales to announce our intentions for the 1987-88 rate support grant settlement, and certain earlier supplementary reports, which can be laid before Parliament immediately on Royal Assent. The purpose here is to give authorities the maximum certainty in setting their budgets and rates over the next two months. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales announced his intentions before Christmas. As I have said, I hope to announce mine tomorrow.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland will reply to the debate. Part II deals with a considerably more limited difficulty in Scotland. Clause 14 validates past actions of the Secretary of State for Scotland in relation to the imposition of grant penalties. It allows him to continue for the future to take into account movements between the general fund and any special fund or account, in the process of estimating a local authority's expenditure for the purpose of imposing grant penalties. Clause 15 provides that, for the future, the Secretary of State may similarly take account of movements between the general rate fund and any special fund or account, in taking decisions about selective action against any authority.

To conclude, the principal effect of the Bill is to validate my Department's and the Welsh Office's practice in calculating relevant and total expenditure over the past six years. It confirms that practice for the future. This is a long-standing, well-established practice for which local government has consistently argued. In the light of the legal advice, the Government had no option but to legislate.

I commend the Bill to the House.

5.15 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): We have heard an uncertain speech from a Secretary of State who is on uncertain ground. I advise him at the outset that if the purpose of today's debate was simply and solely to clarify a point of law, to make the de jure situation accord with the de facto practice since 1981, and for no other purpose, we could complete discussion of the Bill quickly.

No one is opposed to placing the distribution of rate support grant on a proper legal footing. Although we do not like Government policy or the way that the grant is manipulated, we would have agreed to a Bill that intended simply to clarify the law. No such claims can be made for the complex, controversial, centralising and retrospective provisions encompassed by the 17 clauses and four schedules of the Bill.

It is a collection of bad ideas to which we are almost wholly opposed. Even a cursory examination of it exposes the Secretary of State's misleading claims. As the debate has already shown, the legislation contains proposals for even more authoritarian, central powers for Ministers, the denial of any justice—let alone natural justice—to some local authorities. It contains proposals by the Secretary of State to try to set himself above the law, to protect himself from the normal processes of the courts and to deny the basic right of any legal challenge to his arbitrary decisions, which will also be above parliamentary scrutiny and control.

The proposals are draconian, even for this most authoritarian of Governments. No legislature should afford such proposals to any Minister in these circumstances. The Government have brought this fiasco upon themselves and upon local government, against all the evidence and against all the advice of friends and opponents in the House and in the local authorities. The Government have made change after change in local government finance and heaped Act upon Act. Since coming to office they have made 12 major changes in local government finance, mixing malice towards local democracy with ignorance of local government finance, and overlaying all with the stupefying legislative and political incompetence about which we have just heard. On each occasion, in every debate and during every Committee stage, a long line of Secretaries of State and Ministers of State have claimed, "This legislation will simplify the situation," and "This legislation is necessary to clarify the law." Incidentally, the system has been condemned by The Economist, the Audit Commission, the Public Accounts Committee and the Comptroller and Auditor-General.

The right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) began all this at the Tory party conference as long ago as 1979. As there is some sensitivity on Tory Benches about quotations at present, I have brought the text with me in case any hon. Member wishes to challenge it. The right hon. Member for Henley said:

> "We shall, in Government department after department, reduce and eliminate many of the controls that currently link Britain's cities to Whitehall departments . . . We are now starting to tackle not only the capriciousness but the quite ludicrous complexity of the system."

I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman has a conscience or, given his experiences under the Government, whether he will vote Conservative in the next election? He organised all this nonsense, but a few months ago the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Planning told the House, as yet another reckless Bill went through:

> "This Bill is necessary to provide local authorities with certainty about their present and past grant entitlements." —[Official Report, 23 June 1986; Vol. 100, c. 82.]

The same Minister also said:

> "We are about to pass a Bill which will clarify the law." —[Official Report, 21 July 1986; Vol. 102, c. 150-1.]

That Bill received Royal Assent only on 21 October 1986. That gives us one of several clues as to why the Secretary of State deliberately delayed his announcement about this fiasco.

In December, the Secretary of State told the House that he learnt of this matter in late October. Although he refused to be specific, he has now admitted that he has known about it since September last year. If he is worried about the delay in the payment of rate support grant to every local authority, why has he allowed four months to elapse before coming to the House with proposals to rectify the matter? That is reprehensible enough. He knew of the problems a long time ago, but he kept quiet because he wanted to avoid the humiliation of confessing that even more legislation was necessary, even before the previous Bill was on the statute book.

The Secretary of State had other reasons for delaying —even more devious reasons than that. He announced his provisional proposals for next year's rate support grant in July 1986. He expressed his intention to make his final statement in November, but suddenly, and unusually, in October, when Parliament was not even sitting, he issued a second consultation document on which he said he would make final decisions within weeks. What had changed, we wondered? Within weeks, we had an unprecedented third consultation paper on local authority grant, which was greeted with incredulity inside and outside Parliament. We now know that the Secretary of State was fiddling the figures to buy off his Tory Back-Bench critics from the shires and from southern England —another example of the transfer of resources from the north to the south, regardless of need.

The Secretary of State has been forced by Tory party pressure to make a humiliating climbdown on his original grant proposals. He was forced to make those changes despite the damaging consequences of the further withdrawal of funds from many communities in the midlands and the north of England and from some inner-city areas. His grovelling surrender—that is what it is—contrasts starkly with his words on the original decision in July, about which he wrote last August to all Tory councillors. In case he is a bit sensitive about the quotation, I have his letter here. He said this about his first proposals:

"I recognise the strong feelings over the rate support grant for 1986-87. There is no point in going back over that, and it seems more sensible now to look forward to next year. The settlement I announced last month is realistic . . . All of us must make sure we claim the credit for it."

That is what he said to every Tory councillor in August, but he subsequently made two changes to his proposals. I wonder what he is claiming credit for now.

The delay in bringing the measure before the House owes nothing to attempts to clarify the law. It owes everything to the mixture of political ineptitude, fiddling and chicanery that I have just described.

The Secretary of State has tried to absolve himself of any responsibility for the legislative shambles that the Government have created, but he has supported every bit of it, been in the Cabinet which approved it and, in the letter that I mentioned, boasted about it. He claimed in that letter of August 1986:

"I have been closely if not directly involved with all the issues I now deal with."

He cannot escape his massive responsibility for the present state of affairs and the inexcusable delays of his own making.

The Secretary of State could have told the House about this during the debate on the loyal Address. He could have been candid on 3 December in answer to a private notice question which I forced him to answer. If he had acted openly and expeditiously, a short Bill could have already gone through the House to put the matter right. When the right hon. Gentleman finally confessed to the shambles on 16 December, he probably reflected on the words of Ecclesiastes:

"He that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow."

It was indeed a sorry performance. He implied that the law was an ass, but his performance has been a mixture between Mr. Bumble and Bottom the weaver. It is not a Midsummer Night's Dream, more like a midwinter nightmare — I am tempted to say, to paraphrase "A Midsummer Night's Dream," an ass with a hole in it, as some Americans might say less politely.

On 16 December, the Secretary of State not only told the House that he was the only person who was certain what the law is, but he ensured that his officials wrote that day to local authorities to tell them of his certainty. Unfortunately, they had to write on 18 December correcting his view yet again.

The Labour party is opposed to many of the detailed provisions of this highly technical, legal and financially complicated Bill. We oppose the sweeping new powers proposed by the Secretary of State. We question the concept of "proper practice". We oppose the legal immunity that it affords Ministers. We oppose its retrospective penalties on councils. We oppose its effects on rate limited authorities.

Clause 2 talks of "proper practices" in connection with local government rate fund revenue account matters, but offers no definition of them. In finance law, auditors are already under a duty to ensure that councils use proper practices in their accounts. The new proposals need detailed explanation and examination of their effects on the rate support grant system. The de facto position that transfers of cash from the rate fund revenue account to other accounts or special funds were expenditure and that transfers from such special funds back to the account were income was undermined by the legal advice received by the Secretary of State. In his statement of 16 December, he made it clear that the de jure position was that transfers of cash from the account to other accounts were not expenditure and that, consequently, transfers of cash from such other accounts back to the account were not income, could not be regarded as reducing the expenditure of the council and, therefore, could not be helpful in due course in increasing the block grant which that council received. He now claims that the Bill is only an attempt to make the de jure position accord with the de facto practice since 1981. On the face of it, that appears to be helpful to local authorities. The Bill would allow them to continue accountancy practices which have been helpful to them in maximising their entitlement to block grant.

However, that is not necessarily the case. Under clause 2(4), the Secretary of State is given sweeping powers to specify any income to the account as income that can be disregarded as revenue. Instead, such income could, if the Secretary of State deemed or specified it, be treated as a capital receipt or as having a prescribed expenditure portion. In practical terms, therefore, income from leaseback or from some other scheme, now treated as revenue income to a council and thus reducing its expenditure and potentially increasing its grant, could be deemed to be capital income or could be disregarded altogether for block grant purposes. Those are additional wide-ranging powers for the Secretary of State.

Many points arise on this. The Bill appears to be intended to catch councils that attempt to bridge substantial budget gaps by those means. There is no parliamentary restraint on the Secretary of State's discretion to act under the clause. He need not lay an order under the positive or the negative procedures. He may act without parliamentary scrutiny and simply by letter to local authorities. Is that the sort of power that he is asking the House to give him, unscrutinised and unfettered? We respectfully decline.

It is also not clear whether internal transfers of cash from account to account are caught by the procedures specified in clause 2(4). It is clear that transfers of cash from an external source to the account are caught in this way, if the Secretary of State says that they are. He simply has to say so. The Bill is drafted by reference to the word "expenditure" without any definition of what expenditure is. It will therefore be open to any authority to challenge the Secretary of State, regardless of the enactment of the Bill. Clause 5 applies these new rules to the financial years 1983-84, 1984-85, 1985-86 and 1986-87. For all of those years, supplementary rate support grant reports are still to be made. How can the Secretary of State claim that the Bill will not affect decisions that have already been taken? How can he say that it will have no retrospective impact? He cannot possibly know but, in reality, it probably will.

Clause 5 will have effect

"as regards anything falling to be done after (but not as regards anything done before) the passing of this Act."

That is what the Bill says. The power to specify items of expenditure for inclusion or exclusion in the expenditure definitions is applied retrospectively to the intermediate years by clause 9. Clause 10 envisages specifications being part of the rate support grant report or supplementary report for the year in question, but the Bill does not make that obligatory.

As the rate support grant for the intermediate years is not yet closed, it is open to the Secretary of State, in future supplementary reports, to use his power of specification to exclude from the expenditure definitions items of expenditure of which he may disapprove, such as fund contributions which he believes brought certain authorities into deficit for certain years, even if the cause or link cannot be established.

Clauses 4 and 6 have virtually identical provisions in respect of the role of the courts, as they "shall have effect notwithstanding any decision of the court (whether before or after the passing of this Act) purporting to have a contrary effect."

The Secretary of State is there trying to safeguard himself from legal challenges to his arbitrary decisions by local authorities which disagree with him. He is trying to put himself above the law. He is trying to give himself special protection from action in the courts. This extraordinary provision is designed to prevent litigation by any local authority against the Secretary of State's determination of block grant levels to authorities from 1981 to 1986 inclusive. He is asking the House to give him five years of immunity.

Mr. Tony Banks: As my hon. Friend quite clearly understands the technical effects of the Bill better than does the Secretary of State, can he tell me what would be the position under clause 6(4) of Greenwich and the judicial review of the rate support grant settlement for 1986-87?

Dr. Cunningham: I understand that the provision would prevent Greenwich, or any other local authority, from proceeding with a challenge against the Secretary of State which is before or about to come before the courts.

Clause 6 prevents litigation by any local authority against the Secretary of State in respect of his designation of an authority under part I of the Rates Act 1984 in the financial years 1985-87, and in respect of any determination or notification of rate limits and maximum expenditure levels to an authority for the financial year 1987-88.

Having pursued a policy that has been found to be illegal, the Secretary of State is seeking to abolish the right of local authorities to appeal to him through the redetermination procedure, abolishing the effective right of appeal against his decisions that is possible through parliamentary debate on, and voting on, the annual rate limitation orders, and abolishing by ministerial diktat any right of access to the courts in respect of his policies on block grant and rate capping, covering a period of seven financial years. It is quite stupefying that any Minister should try to give himself this much legal immunity. The Secretary of State is quite simply trying to set himself above the House of Commons and the courts. It is a quite new twist to the idea of Crown immunity.

When the Rates Act 1984 was before Parliament, many promises were made by the right hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin) and by the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) about time for consultation. Those promises were even written into the Act. The Government's intentions to abide by those promises were confirmed by the then Secretary of State in an exchange of letters with me in January and February 1985. I shall dispose of the civilities at the beginning, but this is what he wrote:

"Since rate limits were proposed, it has been for each authority to assess its proposed limit in the light of its particular circumstances, and to put forward any proposals which it might wish to suggest by way of alternative limits. I have made clear that I am fully prepared to give details of how I arrived at my proposed limits in the context of negotiations with authorities on possible alternative limits. My clear legal advice is that this is a reasonable approach."

In a subsequent letter, dated 22 February, the right hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford wrote:

"I have always made it clear that if authorities were willing to enter frankly and honestly into discussion of their rate limits—as the Act provides—I would be more than happy for there to be a full exchange of information."

The present Secretary of State is cynically casting aside those promises to Parliament and to every local authority in the country.

Mr. Spearing: My hon. Friend has expressed succinctly a most serious state of affairs with regard to the powers of Parliament against the prerogative of the Crown. Apart from reneging on the assurances that were given in the correspondence that my hon. Friend has just quoted, does he agree that, in the Bill, the Secretary of State is seeking powers retrospectively in respect of legislation with which otherwise the courts would have dealt concerning the past four or five financial years and that he is also blocking appeal to the courts in the future, which would otherwise have been posssible under present legislation?

Dr. Cunningham: Yes. That is exactly my understanding of the Bill.

Mr. Spearing: Disgraceful.

Dr. Cunningham: The kind of problems that I have referred to——

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman should read the Bill again.

Dr. Cunningham: The Secretary of State says that I should read it again, but he gave all the indications that he has not read it once. In the Bill, the promises that I have mentioned and the assurances to the House and to local authorities have been cynically cast aside. This is contemptible behaviour, even by the standards that are as low as those of the Government. It demonstrates yet again how empty and valueless promises from Ministers at the Dispatch Box really are. They are worthless.

Sir Hugh Rossi (Hornsey and Wood Green): During his telling speech, the hon. Gentleman seems to have overlooked what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said earlier. It was the sleight of hand, or almost three-card trick, exercised by certain local authorities which led to an examination of the practice being pursued between local and central Government which, in turn, led to the discovery that the law needed to be put right. Those practices, which deprived other local authorities of some £38 million, are something which all hon. Members would want brought to an end, and it requires certain, precise and definite legislation and powers for the Secretary of State to ensure that such trickery cannot take place.

Dr. Cunningham: If that were the case, I would support his view. If it were a piece of chicanery or political skullduggery, or a deception that was at point, I would agree with him. If it were a simple matter of correcting the law to prevent that kind of eventuality in the future, I would agree with that too. I have already made it clear that if that was what the Bill was about, we would allow it to go through without let or hindrance. However, that is not what the Bill is about, and that is the burden of my argument.

Indeed, it is not established that what the Secretary of State said was correct or accurate for this reason. Birmingham's auditors — Birmingham is one of the authorities mentioned by implication by the Secretary of State — Price Waterhouse, wrote to the Department of the Environment in May 1986 relating to the account, stating:

"We have considered this issue in some detail and have concluded that the contribution is a lawful charge."

Price Waterhouse is a firm of auditors of high repute in the private sector. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that its reputation, work, and professional conduct is suddenly not acceptable; that it is party to some kind of sleight of hand by local authorities; that it is willing to overlook dishonest practices by local authorities? I do not believe that for one moment. Many of the other accounts at stake in this argument and debate have been verified either by independent auditors or by district auditors. That is the reality of the situation. I do not agree with the premises in the first place. If it were the case, I would agree with the hon. Gentleman, but I do not believe it to be so.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): Would it be true to say that the point that my hon. Friend is outlining is the one that has now affected Sheffield, that on 17 December Members of Parliament made representation on redetermination — I say all the Members of Parliament for Sheffield, because one is a Conservative Member, the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Sir J. Osborn). We also went with the acting treasurer for Sheffield who asked the Minister when he would announce the re-determination levels. The Minister said that it would be no later than the second week in January. Yet we come back to the House to find a Bill denying us redetermination.

Dr. Cunningham: I differ slightly with my hon. Friend, because the Bill is not denying redetermination; it is giving it but without taking cognisance of the individual circumstances of each local authority. It is applying a general formula to authorities by class.

Under this legislation, no debates on orders consequent upon the 1984 Act will take place. My hon. Friends will not have the opportunity to raise these matters in the debates, which were promised — indeed, written into the 1984 Act. The rights and safeguards given to rate-limited authorities by that Act are simply removed by the Bill. It is impossible for this House properly to examine the implications of schedule 2 without detailed scrutiny, but they appear to me to be essentially arbitrary decisions. Far from ending uncertainty, this Bill will extend and prolong it because local authorities will not know their final grant entitlement for 1983-1984 until 1988-1989, five years later.

The decision not to validate all past decisions increases uncertainty. At the very least, the retrospective provisions should be dropped and the Rates Act set aside in the coming financial year. Past decisions of councils which have been properly validated and duly certified by auditors, either district auditors or auditors from the private sector, should not be threatened retrospectively. That is a quite shameful act for any Government to embark upon. The question now arises whether councillors can take any lawful decision without the fear that the Government will retrospectively change the rules and move the goal posts. Not surprisingly, local government is rightly opposed to these proposals and contemptuous of the Ministers introducing them. This is bad legislation, guaranteed to sour further the already desperately bad relations between local and central Government. It must be opposed.

5.43 pm

Mr. W. Benyon (Milton Keynes): The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) made great play about the delay between September and December. What he was really saying was that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment should have come to the House without getting legal advice. That is plainly nonsense. He had to go through not one legal process, as I understand it, but three by the time he had finished with my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General.

It is not the fault of my right hon. Friend that the Bill has to be brought to the House today, and I am glad to have that confirmed by the Association of District Councils, which says:

"No blame should be ascribed for making what is now known to be an error in the definitions of expenditure used for rate support grant purposes . . . In reality, all the relevant matters were fully discussed in the appropriate fora, the Secretary of State took his decisions, and Parliament gave them due consideration."

The reason why we are discussing this measure today is the appalling complexity of the system. When I listened to my right hon. Friend opening the debate this afternoon, and the complicated language he used, I thought how appropriate it was that some of us had been here when the tributes were paid to Lord Stockton. We heard the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) recount a very amusing episode in his relations with the then Prime Minister about the appalling complexity of the wording of Government legislation.

I thought that there were one or two people who understood this legislation, whether they were in the Department or local authority associations, but I now begin to wonder whether anybody fully understands the byzantine complexities into which we have got ourselves.

Not only is the system complex, but it was not designed to be overburdened, as it is, with the level of expenditure that it has to meet. This is the point that we have got to, despite all the discussions that have taken place on this vexed subject of local government finance. Rating is a tax on property, and it is an easy and efficient tax to collect, but when the burdens placed upon it become disproportionately high, particularly in the area of education, it becomes manifestly an unfair tax.

[Mr. W. Benyon]

My concern is that the Government's very laudable concern to remedy one unfair tax has pushed them down the path of the community charge, which is now being debated, for Scotland, which is another unfair tax.

Here again, it is not the tax so much as the burden that it has to shoulder that is important. I wish that we could get some sort of consensus in the country that it is the burden, rather than the method, of raising the revenue that is the important matter.

To me—I do not know whether it is to every hon. Member of the House — it is incontrovertible that everybody should in some measure pay towards the costs of local services, or should contribute in some measure, depending on their income.

What is being proposed now and discussed in Committee in relation to Scotland, is not the way to do it. That tax will be seen to be as unfair as rates. Because the charge will be large due to the burden that it has to bear, it will be a heavy imposition; people will not pay it, and the difficulties of collection will be immense. I do not want to trespass into those realms, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I know that you would call me to order.

If there were to be a simple poll tax its collection would at least be easy, but that is not what is proposed. I beg the Government, even at this late hour, and bearing in mind all the difficulties that have been described already this afternoon, to have second thoughts on this tax, or, at least, to allow the Scottish experiment time to be proved or not, as the case may be. Nothing could be more disastrous for England than to introduce a new system which would have to be withdrawn because it proved to be unworkable. Nothing could more damage the relationship between central and local government.

I call in aid the Layfield report, which bears rereading after all these years. It was completed after many years of calm, careful discussion——

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): I am sorry tc interrupt my hon. Friend in the middle of a sentence, but I should like to add that a glance at our 1983 White Paper would show that we came to similar conclusions about the way in which a poll tax would be unworkable.

Mr. Benyon: I accept what my hon. Friend says. It will be remembered that the Layfield committee's conclusion was that if it were decided that a local income tax was not a runner and that the cost would be too great, the present system would be the best. That is still my view. It is perfectly possible to make rates an acceptable, efficient and modern tax. To achieve that, certain things must be done, and the joy is that they can be done almost immediately, with one particular exception.

First, the burden on local government, which it was not expected to bear initially, must be lessened. Therefore, certain items which are now paid for by local government must be tranferred to the Exchequer. Obviously, after the trouble that we have had over the teachers' dispute, teachers' salaries must be a top candidate for that.

Secondly, as the Layfield report suggested, rateable values must be changed from a rentable value to a capital value. People can understand capital values. They know what their house is worth. They do not know its rentable value.

Mr. Spearing: The amount of money that has to be paid is the same, whichever method is used. However, does the hon. Gentleman agree that part of the trouble is that the Government, having contributed 60 per cent. of local government costs, are now contributing 50 per cent.? That is the basic problem to which the Government are not addressing themselves, but that is the problem that the hon. Gentleman is talking about.

Mr. Benyon: I accept that one can argue about the level at which Government grant should be set. However, if one accepts my first point, Government support for local government would increase considerably.

We want a simple system that people understand. People understand what their house is worth, not what it can be let at in the open market, which is the present definition of rateable value.

Thirdly, it is necessary to redefine carefully — this follows the point made by the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham)—the powers of local government in relation to the expenditure that they can undertake. It is no good easing the burden of local government by transferring some of their expenditure to the Exchequer if that can be set at naught by raising extra rates without control.

Fourthly, it is necessary — this is where I support what is being proposed in Scotland — to introduce a uniform business rate and a maximum poundage on other property.

Finally, there should be a simple equalisation factor which everybody can understand and which means that the product of a 1p rate does not fall below a certain figure. Everybody can understand that. With such a system we would not have to talk in the byzantine terms that we have heard today.

With the exception of the revaluation point—I accept all the difficulties that this implies—that system could be introduced immediately. It would be an efficient and cheap system to administer which could be augmented at will with specific grants for urban deprivation and other such matters.

Essentially, in this matter, politics is the art of the possible. We shall not obtain a perfect system, because there is not one. Therefore, let us go for one that makes sense.

5.54 pm

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): I want, first, to stress that the Government have not kept faith with the House in line with the Secretary of State's statement on 16 December. When he came to the House to admit that a grave error had been made he specifically said that the Bill that would come — which is before us today — would make no changes in policy. However, the Bill clearly dos make changes in policy. It makes changes in policy which have failed so many times in the past, increasing the powers of the centre against the legitimate and valid powers of local authorities. What is more, it rules out in the coming financial year the consultations that rate-capped authorities had previously been guaranteed under the Rates Act 1984, putting local authorities into a collective rather than an individual situation.

If local authorities — in particular, those local authorities which the Government dislike so much, led by the likes of Councillor Derek Hatton of Liverpool — tried to do what the Government are trying to do in the Bill, the Government's outrage would have been wondrous to behold. The Government are endeavouring to do by diktat what they cannot do by agreement. That will not work. It has not worked in the past and it will not work in the future.

When the Secretary of State came to the House in December he had to admit in the end that he had first learnt about the legal error in September. Then, on 3 December, at the time of the private notice question of the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), he made comments and statements about the rate support grant which he must have known at that time could not be substantiated in the law as he hoped it would become.

If, as the Secretary of State said again today, local authorities wanted this and welcomed the definition that has now proved to be wrong, they can have welcomed it only in the sense that if one is being guillotined one at least welcomes the blade being sharp. There is no other sense in which local government would welcome past legislation. We have yet again an attempt to deal with local authorities in the most unfair way.

On 16 December the Secretary of State was clearly trying to pass the buck. He tried to blame others. I always thought that, whatever else one tried to accuse Conservatives of, they could not be accused of trying to dodge the doctrine of ministerial responsibility, but that is precisely what they have done in this case. It is monstrously unfair to say that they were advised that local authorities wanted this and that therefore the Government accepted it.

The hon. Member for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon) told us that the Government had to wait for proper legal advice before coming to the House in December. Why on earth did they not have proper legal advice from their officials about the proposals which were put before the House previously and which have now been found to be so grievously wrong?

The matter goes back a long way. I wish that the Government would go back to the historic doctrine of ministerial responsibility and not try to shift the blame. The Government are responsible and the Secretary of State's predecessor, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) is particularly responsible. I wish that he would accept that publicity as well.

The error that we face today is not, at heart, the huge sum of money involved. Of course £70 billion is a vast sum of money, but the error that matters to the House is the error of principle. At the end of the day, there is no way in which the powers and the accounting procedures of individual local authorities can be run by legislation.

There are other constitutional objections. Like the rest of the local government legislation since 1980 which greatly increases central power, this legislation is unprecedented. The Bill attempts to give the Secretary of State power to define how local authorities should make up their accounts. He is given a blanket power to include items in or exclude them from local government's accounting system. But local authorities were legitimately seeking to ameliorate what the Government were doing and the Government did not like it.

The Government's second unprecedented action is their attempt to gain protection from future actions in the courts. The Bill says, in effect, "If a court decision seems to be contrary to what is said here, it should be disregarded." The Bill does not seek to put the Government above the law; it seeks to put them above the courts, and that is a more insidious proposal.

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I am becoming a little confused about what the hon. Gentleman is saying. He seems to be arguing against uniformity of accounting methods. Is he seriously suggesting that local authorities should have their own methods? That seems to be a bizarre contradiction of his opening remarks.

Mr. Meadowcroft: The hon. Gentleman gives himself and his party away. Of course I suggest that within the provisions of the law any local authority, as an individual, corporate, elected body, should be able to present its accounts in ways that it sees fit. Surely we need greater democratic accountability, rather than central dictation.

Conservative Members ought to know that local government has done more to put its house in order than the Government have done to put their house in order. The Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy has codes of practice on local authority accounting and the Controller of Audit at the Audit Commission, Mr. Banham, has said in many reports that local authorities have been better than the Government in their accounting principles and in accounting for finance. It is odd that the hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) should seek to defend what his Government are doing in the name of uniformity.

The Government say that they are abolishing the rating system and moving to some kind of poll tax. However, they are doing nothing about the problem of equalisation. We were told during the Second Reading of Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Bill that central Government payments of rate support grant would be replaced in 1989-90 by revenue support grants, the amount of which would be determined by procedures that were broadly similar to those for rate support grant.

When the Government are seeking to change the system by the method set out in the Bill, it is ridiculous for them not to do something about the equalisation system, which would benefit local authorities. The Government have instead gerrymandered the system in favour of Conservative-controlled shire counties. But the needs are not in those areas and the equalisation process should move in the opposition direction.

Like the hon. Member for Copeland, my colleagues and I feel that if the Bill merely sought to rectify a legal error and to make the position what we thought that it was there would be a case for supporting it. However, in response to my intervention the Secretary of State said that there was the hidden threat that if the Bill were not passed in time it would not be possible to make the appropriate rate support grant settlement. It is monstrous and unjust to say to local authorities which are endeavouring to provide services that if the Bill is held up in Parliament there may be no cash for those services.

Under the guise of correcting a legal error, the Government have attempted to slip through other proposals. That is unacceptable. We oppose the retrospective fiddling of grants to 13 councils, including two Conservative-controlled councils, Cambridgeshire, which is controlled by the alliance parties, and a number of urban authorities, including my own in Leeds.

We also oppose the Secretary of State's powers to interfere with local authority accounting and we regret the Government's failure to make any move towards ironing out the injustices of the existing central-local government relationship.

[Mr. Meadowcroft]

Of course we oppose the attempts of some local authorities to avoid bankruptcy by using separate accounting methods. However, those are different from the accounting methods that have been used to ameliorate the effects of the Government's legislation. What is more, those differences have been spotted by district auditors, as we have seen in various cases that have trundled through the courts. There is no doubt that the professional bodies that were set up to control the accounting of local authorities have accepted the legitimacy of accounting methods that have sought to ameliorate the Government's efforts to do injustice to local authorities. It is a bit rich for the Government to criticise local authorities which acted legally to ameliorate the Government's illegal actions. That is a ludicrous and unjust criticsm.

The order of the clauses in the Bill is not straightforward, and the way in which the measure has been presented is not helpful. Putting past practice on a legal footing is uncontroversial, but the Bill includes unacceptable proposals. It decides which items—credits and debits—should be put into local authority revenue accounts and seeks to control what is described as creative accounting. I do not believe that there is justification for the powers given to the Secretary of State in that area.

The Bill mentions the principles which the Secretary of State may apply, but there is no definition of those principles. That is unjust. How can local councillors, who regulate huge budgets and are responsible for massive services, continue to work if they have no idea what principles the Secretary of State might apply to their accounting practices? The Minister who is to reply to the debate must give us more information.

It is unfair that individual local authorities will not now be able to apply for redetermination for 1987-88. That makes the initial injustice of rate capping even greater. Rather than having rates set under formulae in which some categories, including previously rate-capped councils, are affected even more injuriously, we should look for a better formula to deal with the present system. The proposed formulae will affect different categories of local authorities in different ways, according to the services that they carry out. Police authorities may get extra cash.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): The Secretary of State's formulae mean that there may be a serious danger to property and life in West Yorkshire, because the resources available to the fire and civil defence authority in West Yorkshire will be reduced.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I applaud the hon. Gentleman's ingenuity in making a point to which he knows I am sympathetic. The situation that he highlights is part of the problem presented by the formulae in the Bill. The authority to which the hon. Gentleman referred is not treated as generously under the multiplier in the schedule as it ought to be if it is to cope effectively with the problems that it faces in running a service on which our security and emergency services depend.

I do not know whether all hon. Members have been able to examine in detail the formulae in schedule 2. I hope that in his reply the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland will endeavour to explain them to those of us who have English levels of competence in these matters.

The most amazing thing that I have seen in my three and a half years in the House can be found in schedule 2. There is a large bracket, inside which there is a small bracket. It says:

One might think that that was enough, but one has to turn over the page to find out what T means. Incidentally, I am glad to see, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you are following me closely. The definition of T is given as

$$\frac{A\times M\times 12}{B}$$

I hope that all that will be explained to us. It is certainly a bizarre way of determining what local government has been doing effectively for centuries. It is ridiculous that a Bill should be introduced to deal with a particular point, and that it should then go beyond that in threatening to deny local authorities the money that they need.

Conservatives are saying that they have got us into this mess and that they can get us out of it only by creating an even greater mess and by imposing yet further restrictions on local authorities. However, the Labour party has no alternative proposals for local government finance that would give me any confidence in its doing any better.

It is appropriate that in today's edition of The Guardian, Mr. Ian Aitken makes the very point that I should like to make, in good faith, to Labour Members. He says:

"Mr. Kinnock and his colleagues must act decisively to curb the handful of over-zealous local authorities which are employing left-wing illiberalism to eliminate the illiberalism of the Right. There is no liberty for anyone in replacing one form of political indoctrination for another."

The sad thing is that the actions of some local authorities have been used by the Government as a justification for this sort of measure. I hope that Labour Members will urge the local authorities over which they have some control to avoid giving the Government any further excuse for such action. We say clearly that the Tories have created a complete shambles. They must give local authorities some discretion. The Bill vividly illustrates the impossibility of controlling the vast scale and variety of local government by central Government diktat.

Every piece of legislation on this subject that comes before the House produces a need for more legislation. That will continue, and the Bill will not work any more than the other measures have worked. We must recognise that fact. The Secretary of State may regret what his predecessor commenced in 1979, but he should be big enough to admit it and not try to compound the felony by bringing still more legislation before the House.

Responsibility, in local government just as much as in central Government, comes by increasing democratic accountability and not by external repression. That is the alliance position, and that is why we shall oppose the Bill.

6.13 pm

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): I apologise to the Chair, the House and to the two Front Bench spokesmen, as a very long-standing speaking engagement will almost certainly prevent me from being in the Chamber at the end of the debate. However, I assure my hon. Friend the Minister that I shall read his words carefully, as I hope that he will be able to answer at least one of my questions and perhaps comment on my remarks.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State must be right to introduce legislation when he discovers, as any Minister could, that the practice of the law is not as was thought when the legislation was enacted. I think that that must be common ground between us. There is obviously some urgency, as we must have some certainty in the settlements for future years, which will be delayed until this legislation has been enacted. I echo what has been said by at least one of my hon. Friends, in that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State can scarcely be held to be primarily responsible, given the track record.

To some extent my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) has already raised the query that I have in mind, but I should like to flesh it out. As drafted, clause 5 gives rise to some concern. It seems to allow the Government to amend the rules for the calculation of grant entitlement after the end of a future grant year. I hope that I am wrong, but if I am right, I must say that that is exactly the principle that we encountered in the 1982 Bill—a principle that was then given the quaint title of mid-term holdback — and several of us who served on that Committee succeeded in deleting it. We felt that it was the antithesis of good management for local authorities to be faced, after the end of the year, with something that changed the ground rules. However, I hope that I am wrong. Indeed, I had better keep quiet about those of my hon. Friends who joined me then, as at least one of them is now on the Treasury Bench, and I would not want to embarrass him——

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Gentleman paid the price.

Mr. Squire: I am still here. However, I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will satisfy me on that point, as we have a responsibility to let local authorities plan properly.

I have a second confession to make, in that I served on the Committee dealing with the 1980 Bill, just as only one or two other hon. Members who are now in the Chamber did, including the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing). I should point out that I never voted for block grant either in Committee or in the House, so my conscience is clear. All of seven years ago the drawbacks of block grant seemed fairly clear to me. In the intervening period, there has been little to remove my doubts. My main concern is that I doubt the ability of any Government adequately to be able to measure need in the detail necessary in order not merely to distribute grant but, in effect, to punish and penalise on the basis of those self same statistics. That was my main objection seven years ago, and it remains my main objection. The Bill is the third measure to seek to resolve legal matters arising out of block grant, so one or two of my fears would seem to have borne fruit.

The recent announcement made following representations to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about the distribution of rate support grant serves to highlight how relatively arbitrary distribution can be if it can be amended by simply adjusting a series of multipliers, thus producing a quite different answer. I am not in a position to regret the amended statement that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made, but it served to emphasise the rather blunt instrument that he is dealing with. In that respect, if in no other, I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would agree with me.

It must be something to do with the Christmas air that both I and the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) should find ourselves looking back at the details of the 1980 Act. I happened to find the paper that was submitted in February of that year by all the local authority associations. They pointed out the drawbacks to block grant. Hon. Members will be relieved to know that I do not intend to quote copiously from it, but it is worth summarising the four objectives that the then Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) sought to achieve via block grant and to assess them in the light of what has been achieved.

The first objective was to introduce a simple, readily understood grant distribution system. The second was to place a limit on the extent to which an authority increasing its expenditure could thereby increase its entitlement to grant. The third objective was to end the system whereby the needs element was distributed solely on the basis of an analysis of past expenditure, and the fourth was to stimulate greater public interest in local government and to reinforce local accountability.

We have taken steps with regard to the second and third objectives, but I do not think that anyone would claim that we have introduced a simple, readily understood grant distribution system after seven years, and I am very unsure about reinforcing local accountability. The local councils raised eight points against those objectives. I shall not go through them, as that would not be fair to those hon. Members who wish to speak, but their first and main objection to block grant is as true today as it was then.

The joint paper from those local authority associations says:

> "Although every effort must be made to devise a new and better system of needs assessment, there is no way in which any"— that last word is stressed—

> "centrally-operated, formula-based needs assessment could ever be good enough to enable the government to use it to specify what individual authorities ought to be spending. To attempt to do this will actually reduce local accountability and increase centralist control of local affairs".

I submit that the record of the past few years has been precisely that.

The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) made an interesting interjection when he rightly said that there has been a reduction over the years in the amount of support given to local authorities by central Government. I part company with the hon. Gentleman in only one respect but the difference between us is absolute. If local authorities had a sufficiently dynamic and sizeable enough opportunity to raise finance, it would be right and positively desirable to reduce the amount by which authorities rely on central Government. Those in the Chamber who have been councillors, let alone the chairman of a finance committee—a role in which I found myself—will know that the amount that comes from the centre, as it were, can transform any other figure in the accounts. I am speaking of the majority of authorities that still receive support.

An authority may be a good one in that it follows all the guidelines and is efficient, or it may be the reverse, but in any event the size of the central Government figure will be the single greatest determinant. For that reason I look for something that will reduce Government support to the level at which it balances out needs requirements and resource equalisation. That would be the minimum level of central support. I would wish to see local authorities granted greater accountability for their actions by linking their expenditure much more to the moneys that they are able to raise. I realise that in saying that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am talking about matters that are not related exactly to the Bill.

The relationship between central Government and local government is and has been confused, and the confusion has not lessened in recent years. I recognise that a Government have an absolute right to lay down the legal framework within which the local authorities operate—we must concede that to the Government of the day—but I have always been rather more concerned about the right of government to lay down policy priorities within that relationship. There is a difficulty in the Government of the day laying down policy priorities because of the problems that attach to them being able fully to appreciate the individual priorities of about 400 authorities, and because I want there to be some sense, purpose and meaning behind the principle of individuals standing for election and being elected as members of local authorities. In that sense I wish to see the relationship between local authorities and central Government become much clearer.

I wish also to echo a suggestion which has been made elsewhere on previous occasions. It is scarcely novel, but I wish to put it on record. In any event, it is the first time that I have raised it in the Chamber. I can see advantage in the House having a Committee that is charged with examining central Government and local government relationships in the context of any proposals that appear to effect the constitutional relationship. I should like that proposal to be considered and examined. Relationships have changed in recent years and local authorities are seen now, and far more than in 1979, as the agents of the Government of the day. That must be right in many respects because local authorities are the deliverers of so many services, and it must be right for the Government of the day to be able to require by law that a number of tasks are carried out. There are many other areas, however, that are grey and the net effect of changes over recent years seems to be that the ability of local authorities to determine has been reduced. I am not sure whether that is a good thing. I say that when a Conservative Government are in office. If in some God-forsaken century we have a non-Conservative Government I shall make the same comment, but perhaps in even stronger terms.

Mr. Terry Davis: We shall give the hon. Gentleman a job.

Mr. Squire: I shall still be a Conservative.

The House should be interested in the relationships between local authorities and central Government and between Parliament and local authorities. I want to see these relationships improve, but there are few in local government who believe that in recent years we have seen an improvement. Some councils have acted stupidly and some have had their share of idiotic behaviour, and that should be recognised, but the majority of councils continue to seek in their limited way to undertake the duties and functions for which they were elected. I wish them godspeed in their task.

6.26 pm

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): The Secretary of State tried to explain in his opening remarks that the Bill is a validating measure. It has already been said, however, that the Bill goes much further than that. It extends the Secretary of State's powers in a sweeping fashion and undermines the position of the courts when reviewing Ministers' actions. It introduces even more controls on local authorities.

Surely sufficient controls have been placed on local authorities over the years. Since my arrival in the House in 1983 I seem to have spent a great deal of my time listening and speaking in debates on local authorities and much less time listening to and participating in debates on what central Government should do to get out of the present economic mess and reduce unemployment. The Government have imposed restraints on the advertising activities of local authorities and the functions of local authorities and have abolished county councils.

The Government are obsessed with the notion that this place knows better than local authorities, and having spent many years in local government I know that that is not the position. I remain convinced that the members of any party in a local authority can still provide a much better service in a democratic system than can central Government.

The Bill makes it clear that there is no control over the Secretary of State. More control is to be placed on local government while there is to be less control on the Secretary of State. Indeed, there will be no parliamentary restraint on him. When the Bill is enacted, he will not have to lay orders within the terms of this measure and he will be able to act without parliamentary scrutiny. That means that there will be no control. It cannot be said that the Bill will produce greater democracy and accountability.

It is made clear in the Bill that the Secretary of State is seeking to validate past acts and to protect himself. If local authorities had acted in the same illegal way, would they have enjoyed the same charity and understanding as we are expected to extend to the Secretary of State? I do not believe so. In such circumstances local authorities would be described as irresponsible and a threat to democracy and the Government might even suggest that we should abolish them. It appears, however, that the Secretary of State is able blithely to justify his own actions at the expense of local government.

Local councillors do a tremendous job and it must be increasingly difficult for them to motivate themselves to serve local citizens and their authorities when so many constraints are placed upon them. I attended a meeting of Sheffield city council when it debated the Bill last week, and there were expressions of concern from Labour, Conservative and Liberal councillors. Attention was drawn to the damage that is likely to be done to city councils and town councils throughout the country. Sheffield recognises that enormous damage is likely to be caused. The Bill will destroy the present process of financial planning. It will withdraw the right to have the financial circumstances of a city council taken into account. It will deny the constitutional right of judicial review of decisions taken by the Secretary of State. The city council has make it clear to the Minister that it cannot provide the basic acceptable level of services, spelt out to him not only by the city council but the chamber of commerce.

I have a copy of a letter from the Sheffield chamber of commerce to the Minister. The letter is not partisan. It makes it clear that the chamber of commerce understands that "the Local Government Finance Bill, 1986—published on 18 December 1986—will set aside the previous procedures for rate re-determination laid down in the Rates Act 1984, and would thereby appear to ignore the representations made to you by the Sheffield Chamber delegation".

That delegation was led, of course, by Mr. Stokes, the president. The letter continues:

"If this assumption is correct"—

this is the chamber of commerce asking the Secretary of State—

"please let me know, because I would not like to think that our time had been wasted."

The letter goes on to state:

"An unfortunate by-product of the new Bill is the fact that no formal announcement about the Rate Support Grant Settlement will now be made until later in January, whereas it had previously been anticipated in November 1986. To a Council facing as many budgetary problems as Sheffield, this delay is counterproductive, as it will provide certain elements on the Council with the excuse to do nothing about tackling the deficit which the Council has to meet in 1987/8. Instead of certainty about the size of the cuts, there is now uncertainty, and this is definitely the wrong background for budgetary planning.

As a Chamber, we will continue to press the City Council to budget in a responsible manner, but at the same time, I must register the comment that the Government's present timetable for new legislation has not helped this process at all, and indeed, has been distinctly unhelpful."

That comment does not come from a Labour council or any other party that is opposed to the Conservatives; it comes from the Sheffield chamber of commerce.

Those are the facts. No one could run a business in the way in which the Government expect local authorities to operate. No one can make predictions when, frankly, it is not known, according to the whim of the Secretary of State, when grants are likely to come to pass and what their level is likely to be.

The legislation will affect places such as Sheffield, which is already suffering a tremendous level of redundancies because of the decline in engineering, steel production and matters of that nature. A 15 per cent. cut will mean another 4,200 jobs being lost within the local authority itself. Therefore, it will not help the rate of unemployment and certainly will not help the morale of the city. It will mean further cuts in the education budget in which there are bound to be problems. It is not only the chamber of commerce or the Labour party in Sheffield who are worried about this, but the Conservative opposition who, quite rightly, put up their own budget. Even they found that, despite significant savings and cuts, they could not match the Government's rates demands. The Conservative opposition could not do it, and they accepted the facts.

Amongst our delegation to the Minister to discuss this matter was the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Sir J. Osborn). He stressed that Sheffield could not cope with the present restraints. That remark was completely ignored, as has already been said. While we debated the issue, the Bill was being printed. That is an insult not only to the delegation but to the city council and the citizens of Sheffield.

I now refer briefly to the likely effect of the legislation on south Yorkshire services. Some of my colleagues also wish to raise issues of this nature. If the Bill as it stands is passed, the current high standards of fire cover and local transport networks in south Yorkshire will certainly be jeopardised. There was a meeting of Sheffield and south Yorkshire Members of Parliament with the officers of the south Yorkshire authorities. We discussed matters relating to transport, fire and the police. One matter that arose and that we believed to be serious was whether the South Yorkshire fire and civil defence authority could have manning levels that would allow it to spend only £21·2 million, which is more than £1 million less than requested. It could mean that the fire service could not carry out its statutory duties, according to the requirements of the Home Office. I should like the Minister to bear this point in mind. If we limit an authority's finances and it cannot carry out its duties according to Home Office levels, there must be some more hard talking. It does not help when the fire service was refused a meeting with the Minister. To this day, that meeting has not taken place.

Surely the Secretary of State must take into consideration the fact that the fire service is in serious danger of being unable to carry out its statutory duty. It also has the problem of whether it can protect the property and the life and limb of people in south Yorkshire. In my constituency, a retained fire station is likely to close because of financial restraints. Its closure will mean a considerable difference to fire services in the area. It is an area in which there is an old folks' home, a school and high-rise flats. I wish to know whether the Government, and the Secretary of State in particular, have fully considered the possible dangers to life and limb posed by these financial restraints. Has a pure accounting exercise been carried out by the Treasury that the Secretary of State must administer? Lack of cash will mean that the new multi-million pound fire station in Sheffield will not be able to open. What sort of economic sense does that make? Lack of cash will mean redundancies of 30 to 40 firemen in south Yorkshire and no new recruitment. It will also mean the mothballing of the training school and no replacement of any personnel or vehicles.

I wish to refer briefly to the transport system of which south Yorkshire is very proud. It is no longer under the same control since the abolition of the county council. There is no doubt that there will be a further reduction in services in south Yorkshire. Concessionary fares will be threatened. Services such as Saturday shopping services, early morning services and business services will be reduced. It will mean, because Sheffield is rate-capped, that the transport system cannot be subsidised to help people to do their shopping or engage in other activities. It will mean the delay of better rail services, including more frequent local trains and improved services in the Dearne valley. In the final analysis, it will mean that the services of which the city and south Yorkshire are proud will be quite unrecognisable when the final crunch comes and the financial restraints are fully implemented.

This is a bad and dangerous Bill. It is bad because it does not help local democracy. It is dangerous because it will affect life and limb in Sheffield and south Yorkshire. The Bill is disliked by all parties in local Government and by those in private business. The Government have made many mistakes in local government. They should now drop this Bill to avoid another.

6.38 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): Since I have been a Member of the House, I have interested myself in matters concerning local government, and local government finance in particular. As I represent the constituency of Basildon and live daily with some of the bizarre activities of the local authority, perhaps it is inevitable that I should interest myself in these matters. Several hon. Members have already mentioned the amount of local government legislation that has passed through the House during the past three and a half years. They seem to resent the interference. There is no doubt that the traditional relationship between local authorities and central Government has changed in a regrettable fashion. Unfortunately, a minority of local authorities have refused to accept the result of the 1983 general election. I am sure that several Opposition Members are embarrassed by some of the actions taken by the local authorities to which I refer.

Mr. Tony Banks: Though I do not wish to debate the point that the hon. Gentleman made, does he not agree that the change in the relationship started in 1979 with the election of the Conservative Government, and that since 1979, particularly in relation to finance, in which the hon. Gentleman is so interested, the rate support grant from central Government has fallen each year?

Mr. Amess: The hon. Gentleman will be pleased to hear that in my brief speech, I shall take up the specific point about the rate support grant settlement. He highlighted the 1979 election, but he makes my point for me. Over the decades, local councils have accepted the result of general elections because they believe in democracy, so, if the hon. Gentleman is right, it is unfortunate that somehow they resented the result of the 1979 general election and carried that resentment through into disgraceful behaviour in several areas. However, as the hon. Gentleman rightly said, we should not digress along that road.

I agreed with my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon) who, like myself, represents a new town, about the complexities of local government finance. He called it byzantine. However, I disagreed with my hon. Friend in his remarks about the community charge and the Bill now going through the House, which concerns the change in the rating system in Scotland. I support the Government on those two issues. I applaud and take my hat off to the Government in that at long last we have a Government who have had the guts and courage to take a firm decision on that matter. Inevitably, the system will be extremely successful throughout the country and very popular.

Since I have been a Member of this honourable House, we have had three Secretaries of State for the Environment. When I listened to each deliver his rate support grant settlement, so complicated were they that I thought what brillant people those men must be. I wonder how many of us humble Back Benchers understand the way in which the rate support grant settlements are calculated or, more importantly, how many of our constituents understand the complexity of those settlements. I hope that the civil servants concerned with those matters understand what they are recommending to their Ministers.

That being said, I have no doubt that the Bill will be helpful for both the Government and the local authorities, in working together on the rate support grant. The greater clarity in definitions of expenditure and income and the specific formulae now used to calculate expenditure of the councils will lead to less ambiguity and hence less conflict in the calculations of the Government and the local authorities. That will also help local authorities to project with greater certainty what the size of their grant will be, so that they can more easily calculate their expenditure for the future.

I was particularly interested in clause 1(4), which requires local authorities to itemise in detail the various things on which they are spending ratepayers' money. It is at this point that I wish to quote briefly from a letter sent just before Christmas from three Labour party supporters to the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Lords. They say:

"We were life-long Labour voters until we were faced with the almost unbelievable fact that the Labour Party in Haringey has become a cover for the anti-democratic left, who are abusing the education of our children with the apparent aim of undermining our families and democracy. We have been told by Bernie Grant and others that Haringey is only a test case, and that other boroughs are soon to be subjected to similar treatment."

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Will the hon. Gentleman explain why he is laughing while he is saying those strange things?

Mr. Amess: I am certainly not laughing in the sense that I regard this as being a matter for a joke, but I am simply smiling wryly. Not many hon. Members have addressed their remarks to the detail of the Bill, but they have picked up peripheral points. It will be interesting to see how many hon. Members who follow me address their remarks to subsection (4). It highlights these points, which I fully accept are rather embarrassing to Opposition Members and make them feel a little uncomfortable.

The letter goes on:

"We hear that Hackney, Ealing, Islington and Lambeth already have our problems."

As my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government has said, the local authority that serves his area in Brent should be mentioned in that vein. The letter goes on:

"It is of course very difficult to discover precisely what is going on in nursery and primary schools"——

Mr. Leighton: Who was the letter from?

Mr. Amess: The letter continues:

"but we enclose a copy of 'The Play Book for Kids about Sex'".

The hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) groans. I understand his groaning because, as I said, such matters embarrass Opposition Members and make them feel uncomfortable. But frankly, "The Play Book for Kids about Sex" is extraordinary and any parent would be horrified to think that in 1987 any local authority of any political party was prepared to spend ratepayers' money on the disgraceful contents of that booklet.

Another book written by Rachel Tingle, published by Pickwick Books, goes into great detail, and this shows the amount of money that is spent by certain local authorities that are fascinated by the subject of sex. It has been in existence from time immemorial. I do not know why such matters have to be written about in books for young children and why ratepayers' money has to be spent in that way when all Opposition Members plead for more resources in their local authorities. That is disgraceful and reprehensible. I know that Conservative Members will wish to pay tribute to the Government for what they have done in the Bill. Subsection (4) will require local authorities to list such expenditure in future. Therefore, it will be possible for those matters to be brought to the attention of the public.

I am also pleased to see that there is provision to continue the rate capping of local authorities. It is important to control their spending, and rate capping, as we have found in my constituency of Basildon, is an effective way of doing so until the community charge system can be implemented. I, for one, look forward to that very much, as do the majority of my constituents.

This is the point that I mentioned to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). We must not forget that many councils do not misuse the ratepayers' money and have kept their spending well under control. One such council is Essex county council. The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) will be interested in this point. Over the past five years Essex county council has spent less than what was suggested in the Government's projections. However, the rate support grant has steadily decreased, from £148 million in 1983-84 out of a county budget of £464 million, to £110 million for 1987-88 out of a budget of £574 million. Unfortunately, that represents a loss of nearly £40 million and a percentage loss of over 10 per cent. of Essex county council's budget. We in Essex cannot afford that loss. In 1983-84 the rate support grant was 31 per cent. of the budget. In 1987-88 it will not even represent 20 per cent. of that budget. That is a significant and serious loss to the ratepayers of Essex.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I am following the hon. Gentleman's speech with great interest, but I find it difficult to square what he just said about how his county has been penalised with what he said earlier in support of the Bill about the certainty that would come about as a result of its passage through the House. Is he aware that there have been massive turn-abouts and cuts in Government support for Cleveland county which make long-term planning of budgets impossible, apart from causing deprivation?

Mr. Amess: I thank the hon. Gentleman for making that valid point. If he allows me to continue a little longer, I shall help him to square those remarks when I reach my specific point.

The rate support grant for Essex has fallen, although the county council has not been an overspending authority. According to the statistics compiled by the Audit Commission, Essex county council has spent 20 per cent. less per person than the average for English counties and it has spent 15 per cent. less per person than the average for similar counties. The English counties' average was £351·91 per person, the average for similar counties, called the family average, was £345·93 per person and Essex county council spent £331·46 per person.

The council has also taken significant cost-effective measures to increase the savings to local ratepayers. Since 1979-80 Essex has consistently made savings — these remarks are addressed primarily to my Front-Bench colleagues—totalling about £75 million. Fuel bills have been cut by £33 million, we have a severe problem of falling school rolls, so the surplus school places have been taken out of use, saving £15 million, cleaning costs have been reduced by £3 million and the school meals service has been rationalised, saving £5 million. Clearly, we have striven to get better value for money.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): As Essex is my native county I have listened to the hon. Gentleman's catalogue with great interest and it confirms what those of us who have lived in Essex have always known—that it is one of the meanest counties on record. Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that because of that record of meanness the Conservative vote in the 1985 shire county elections sunk to a historic low?

Mr. Amess: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman made that point, although I am beginning to regret making these remarks because I am probably helping him with his speeches in Committee. I am probably saving him having his researchers find up-to-date facts about Essex county council. I regret that the Conservative party lost control of the council and the ratepayers of Essex now regret the hung council. If ever there was proof that a hung Parliament and hung councils are disastrous, it is in Essex. I invite hon. Members to come to Essex to find out how it does not work. I thank the hon. Gentleman for helping me make that point.

Despite the fact that the cost of many programmes that must be funded by the council is increasing faster than the rate of inflation, for example, because of the expanding need for care of the elderly and larger police forces to combat crime, the council's projected spending remains at or below the rate of inflation and well within the limits of Government expectations. If the rate support grant is reduced, it will leave a deficit of £28 million and Essex county council will have no alternative but to increase the rates by a considerable sum.

Just as local authorities which overspend and misuse their funds should be penalised, so local authorities which stay well within the guidelines should be rewarded. I emphasise that point to my hon. Friends on the Front Bench. Essex county council is such an authority and its grant should not be reduced this year from the previous figure. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will reconsider Essex county council's rate support settlement to correct that obvious injustice.

I support the Bill in the hope that the subject will become better understood and that Essex county council's rate support grant will not only become more comprehensively understood, but, most important, be more acceptable.

6.55 pm

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): The lack of support for the Bill from Government Back Benchers is startling. I thought that we might have had support for the Bill from the hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess), who is a political refugee from Newham, but after his opening sentences his speech was a long paean of complaints about how the Government are ill-treating Essex, like the rest of us, although it has made all the cuts imaginable.

I have been invited to a meeting on 18 February where the chief speaker is to be Mr. John Banham, the new director-general of the Confederation of British Industry. The title of the address is, "Should local government survive?" which is relevant, in view of what is happening, but perhaps a more appropriate title would be, "Does local government still exist?"

Local government has been stifled and throttled by the Government and the Bill is the last straw. The Government are reducing it to a farce and an absurdity. Under the Bill, all power is to be centralised. The Secretary of State is arrogating to himself sweeping, dictatorial powers. The Bill undermines the position of the courts in reviewing Ministers' actions. If that persists it will become increasingly difficult to get people to serve in local government because they will be mere puppets or, as the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) said, mere agents, cyphers who are unable to make policies.

The Secretary of State is destroying local democracy, turning it into a sham and undermining local civil leadership. He is taking powers to dictate a council's expenditure, ignoring local authorities' assessments of local needs and plans to meet them. This meddling and intervention from afar is creating an impossible position. Local government is treated little better than a criminal if it seeks to exercise its own choices or to invoke the moral authority of its election. That devalues and poisons the democratic process. What is the point of electing local councillors if they are to be powerless and everything is to be decided by diktat and intervention based on arid, arcane formulae from Whitehall?

Previously, we always had a balance between local and central Government, but that is being disrupted and destroyed, causing great damage to our public life. This is causing bitterness and alienation among people with a lifetime of service to local government. Nowhere is greater damage and havoc being caused than in the London borough of Newham which is being placed on the rack by this Bill.

While the rate support grant proposals of 3 December 1986 gave more money to the wealthy Conservative boroughs, it took £6 million away from Newham. It is certainly true that "Unto every one that hath shall be given . . . but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath."

While Newham is wrestling with the gravest problems—the downward spiral of inner-city decay—from which it is desperately trying to escape, the Government are robbing it of millions of pounds. That is their contribution to our plight.

First, the borough is rate-capped, which is supposed to limit the rate burden. Then, the Government impose a multi-million pounds cut in rate support grant, thus putting pressure on the rates. To do both simultaneously causes a financial disaster. Is that what the Minister wants? The Government proposals are crazy and irresponsible. If the Bill goes ahead, I view the future of the borough with foreboding.

There are conditions in Newham which look like a riot waiting to happen. Some of us have sought to ameliorate these conditions, but the Government, through this Bill, are sabotaging those efforts. They are throwing lighted matches on to the tinder. I say to them publicly today that that is highly irresponsible.

The Bill could wipe out the £5 million now being given by the borough to voluntary organisations to alleviate the bleakness of life for many local people. Is that what the Minister wants? That is what will happen. There would also be cuts in basic services such as education, and there would be large-scale sackings. Is that what the Minister wants?

It is frustrating for me, as a constituency Member of Parliament, making appeals in this Chamber for an Adjournment debate — in this House as I did a few weeks ago about homelessness in the borough and deputations to the Minister giving the facts — when Ministers seem blind and deaf to our needs and give no evidence or sign that they care a jot about the welfare of Newham and its people.

What is Newham's position? If Ministers listen to nothing else that I say, I hope that they will listen to this point. I should like to think that the Government are interested in this issue.

Newham's original budget for 1986-87 was £167·161 million. The expenditure was rather more—about £170 million. The forecast level of expenditure for 1987-88 is £194·7 million. That figure would give a standstill budget with a continuation of present policies and commitments. The expenditure level set by the Government is based on a formula set on the original budget for 1985-86. Here is the rub, and I hope that the Minister will listen. The 1985-86 budget is an unrealistic basis for rate capping because it was distorted by special accounting measures. That was accepted by the Minister's Department, and is the reason that he allowed us to come for redetermination.

We met the Minister to discuss redetermination and asked for a redetermined expenditure level of £175 million. The Minister was complimentary—he said that we were polite and courteous and put a reasonable case. I note that the Minister is nodding. However, before we received any reply from the Minister we were overtaken by the new Bill, with an even worse proposed expenditure level of £157·4 million. I ask the Minister to believe me when I say that that puts Newham into a desperate position. To be precise, the proposed expenditure level is £10 million less than this year's budget. It is £18 million less than the amount applied for on redetermination. It is £33 million less than the forecast expenditure level for 1987-88.

Put another way, the new implied expenditure level is 3·6 per cent. above GREA, while the original budget for 1986-87 was 18·4 per cent. above GREA. What the Government are asking for and demanding from Newham is a 15 per cent. cut. I beg the Minister to believe that that is wholly unrealistic. Both the finance director and the chief executive of the London borough of Newham told the Under-Secretary on 19 November last year that that reduction was unachievable, even if the will were there to achieve it. Even to attempt it would mean unnecessary chaos and major diseconomies, as, for example, the cost of redundancy payments.

The Government are imposing a standard formula on all authorities of a certain class. That overrides individual circumstances. It is grossly unfair to have a standard formula for all authorities regardless of their circumstances. Why do the Government come forward with such an idea? The only explanation I have is that the Bill would be hybrid were that not the case. The Minister is nodding. The reason for the outrageous proposal that all authorities should have a 2 per cent. uprating is so that he can remedy his legal position. That is why he must bring something forward quickly.

The Secretary of State said that local authorities could not come to his Department, as they did previously to the Minister of State, because there would not be time. The Government have got themselves into a legal fiasco. To clear it up quickly, as this Bill seeks to do, leaves no time for us to come back to the Government and for them to look into the cases of individual authorities. Therefore, although the Bill is grotesquely unfair and inequitable for the London borough of Newham, it must be the victim and suffer for the incompetence of the Government.

Mr. Tony Banks: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is making a good case. Does he not share with me the feeling that, when the three Newham Members of Parliament went to see the Minister to apply for redetermination, we were wasting our time because by then, at the end of November, he must have known that the Bill would come before the House and that there would be a class increase in terms of expenditure limit and, therefore, the particular plea from Newham would be disregarded?

Mr. Leighton: I am driven to that conclusion. I do not like to take a cynical view of our parliamentary processes. I would have liked to think that there was a serious purpose and that the Minister was serious. I do not like to think that he was just stringing us along while he knew all the time that, regardless of what we said, he would not take a blind bit of notice and that the whole thing was to be overtaken by the new Bill. Its appalling formula that he must use to prevent the Bill being hybrid crucifies Newham. That is the only conclusion that I can reach.

One reason why the Bill is unfair is that no allowance is made for the need to restore balances. Because of the need to restore Newham's balances, our expenditure level on that account alone will be reduced by a further £2 million. In particular, as the formula is based on a distorted year, it brings about an unrealistic, absurd and grotesque result.

Is it legitimate or prudent for the Government to place such an imposition on the people of Newham? A table that I gave civil servants to give to the Minister shows that, of the different case examples of the 20 rate-capped authorities, Basildon is 70·5 per cent. above GREA; Thamesdown 62 per cent.; Greenwich 38 per cent.; Camden 35 per cent.; and Newham is right at the very bottom at 1·6 per cent. above GREA. That is ludicrous and outrageous. It is completely crazy and monstrously inequitable.

If the 1985-86 Budget were adjusted to take account of the special accounting in that year and the formula were then applied, Newham would be 10 per cent. above GREA. We would be roughly half-way in this table. The borough could live with that, and something of that nature has to be done. I hope that the Ministers have listened to what I have said and taken it on board. There must be a more reasonable approach and a more rational formula.

One of the worst features of the Bill is that for the first time there is no appeal. We cannot meet Ministers, as we normally do, to ask for redertermination and to ask them to consider cases on their merits. We have heard that this is because they do not have time because of the legal fiasco. The whole thing is to be steamrollered through, regardless of the consequences, without any proper examination of the details of Newham's case. I hope that that aspect will be looked at again in Committee.

By far the best thing, since the Secretary of State has found that he has been acting unlawfully and there is now a hiatus, would be to take the opportunity to abolish rate capping. If it is persisted with, the formula must be amended in such a way as to ensure that justice can be done to authorities such as Newham. This must be a priority in Committee, if Second Reading is given. I shall table amendments to that effect. If such adjustments are not made, I advise the Government that the consequences in Newham will be dire and catastrophic.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment announced his intention to introduce the Bill I felt a sense of deja vu, because just under 12 months ago we had before us another Local Government Finance Bill which was designed to plug loopholes in the operation of block grant and legitimise what had gone before. It is right that we should legislate to confirm action that is past. No useful purpose would be served, and it would not serve the interests of local authorities, by overturning all settlements made under the 1980 Act. Chaos would ensue.

Equally, it is legitimate for the Government to include in the Bill measures to prevent local authorities from cooking the books. We normally refer to this as creative accounting, but that still means cooking the books. There is nothing terribly reprehensible about that. In my days as a London borough leader a certain amount of creative accounting was undertaken. I venture to suggest that when my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State was leader of a London borough there might have been a little shading of the figures, even in the true blue and upright borough of Wandsworth.

When the Government detect that the books have been cooked, either to screw more grant out of central funds or to benefit one authority at the expense of others, there is no reason for the authorities which are caught out to cry foul or for Members of Parliament who represent those constituencies to suggest that there is anything improper in the Government stopping up a loophole. I venture to suggest that Labour Members would not be protesting if my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer were introducing a clause into the Finance Bill to stop a tax loophole—some lacuna in tax legislation that had been exploited by those wishing to minimise their tax liabilities. Similarly, it is legitimate when the Government seek to prevent local authorities from increasing their entitlement to grant at the expense of other authorities or the taxpayers.

Mr. Straw: From time to time Finance Ministers announce that from the day of their announcement some particular financial transaction will be unlawful, so the legislation is retrospective to the day of the announcement. However, can the hon. Gentleman think of any occasion when there has been a financial transaction that was lawful at the time, certified as lawful at the time by the accountants, but some years later Parliament has legislated to make that action unlawful?

Mr. Watts: The hon. Gentleman will know that the opinion of the auditor on a matter of taxation carries no weight, and even if a tax assessment is accepted and it is subsequently found within six years that some error has been made, that can be overturned. The hon. Gentleman introduced the opinion of the auditor, but that has no relevance to the legitimacy or validity of the action that has been taken.

Mr. Spearing: What the hon. Gentleman is suggesting is more serious. He is suggesting, in the equivalent to his analogy, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could come to the House and introduce a Bill which says that he and not the courts will decide the application of the Finance Bills of the previous three years, and he and not the courts will decide the determination of the Finance Bill for that year and succeeding years. Is that not a reasonable analogy for how the Bill applies to local government?

Mr. Watts: No, it is not. From what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said when he introduced the Bill, the hon. Gentleman's description does not fit what the Bill sets out to do.

Mr. Spearing: That is what is in the Bill, not what the Secretary of State said about it.

Mr. Watts: The hon. Gentleman will make his own speech and his own points. I should like to get on with mine.

It is not just this year that legislation has been necessary to stop up loopholes in the block grant mechanism. The Bill is merely the latest evidence of the near total failure of the 1980 Act to provide a sensible, certain and fair basis for distributing rate support grant. In 1982 we had to have a Bill to introduce penalties because the mechanism of the block grant had failed to restrain extravagant authorities from pushing up their expenditure. It had not provided the sharp accountability between authority and ratepayer that the architects of the 1980 Act had intended. Events proved that that did not work either, and so in 1984 we had to introduce rate capping. Both penalties and rate capping have, at best, been a limited success in restraining the excesses of high-spending authorities.

While I am perfectly content and think that it is right for us to legitimise, within the Bill, the settlements that have gone before, I am less happy that we are continuing for the next and ensuing years the continuation of this discredited system of grant distribution. To that extent, I look upon the Bill as a missed legislative opportunity, because it does not address the most serious problems of the rate support mechanism.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has promised that we shall have legislation to abolish domestic rates, to introduce a community charge and to review the grant system, at the latest in the first Session in the new Parliament. I am optimistic, and I like to place emphasis on those words "at the latest" and to harbour some hope that the legislation will come earlier. Unlike my hon. Friend the Minister for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon), I do not have reservations about the community charge or his optimism that the rating system could be adapted to provide us with an acceptable mechanism for raising local government taxation. The day when we carry through a major reform of local government finance cannot come too soon for me.

The urgency about removing the uncertainty relating to previous years' settlements would not allow this Bill to be replaced by the thoroughgoing reform that was foreshadowed in the Green Paper, and it could not be enacted within it. It would be completely unrealistic of me to ask my right hon. Friend to introduce such a reform. However, I remain to be convinced that it would not be possible in the Bill to deal with reform of the grant system. For past years we should thereby legitimise what had happened, but for future years — perhaps not for the financial year 1987-88, but for the financial year 1988-89 and thereafter — there would be a different system for distributing grants.

The block grant mechanism that was introduced by the 1980 Act is fundamentally flawed. For six years, as leader of a London borough, I grappled with the problems that the block grant system imposed and came up against some of its major difficulties. It is based upon a specious sophistication that ultimately fails to provide a sensible assessment of needs or a fair basis for distributing grants. In one year, the calculation of the grant-related expenditure assessment for library services was based upon the square footage of retail floor space. There may be some relationship between shoppers and those who use libraries, but the connection is not so close or obvious as I would expect. That is what I mean by "specious sophistication".

There is also the major flaw of poundage equalisation. If the system worked perfectly and delivered the results that its architects designed it to deliver, the result would still be unfair to ratepayers in areas with high rateable values, such as my county of Berkshire. If all authorities delivered exactly the standard of service envisaged by GREA, and if the rate was therefore levied at the same rate in the pound in every authority, some ratepayers would face bills twice as high as those faced by ratepayers in other parts of the country because of the wide disparities in rateable values, which in no way are reflected in differences in levels of income.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that that has never been the way to compare like with like in different local authorities? A better measure would be the rate paid per head of population or per hereditament. The valuation differs, but a much better equalisation process is to look at what is actually paid.

Mr. Watts: I think that the hon. Gentleman supports my point. Even if the system succeeded in equalising the rate poundage between authorities, which is what it tries to do, the rate bill faced by an individual domestic ratepayer would be twice as high in the Greater London area as in Yorkshire and Humberside. The average domestic rateable value in Yorkshire is 30 per cent. below the national average, while the average domestic rateable value in Greater London is 30 per cent. above the national average. Even if the system achieved what it set out to achieve, the result would be extremely unfair.

The attempt to equalise rate poundage leads to the inexorable transfer of grant away from areas of high rateable value per head, such as my county of Berkshire, and, I suspect, Essex, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) referred in his speech. Because of the way in which the block grant mechanisation works, it has the effect of weakening the accountability of local authorities to their ratepayers. Changes in grant, which have a major effect on the level of any rate increase which has to be levied, may bear no relation whatsoever to the expenditure decisions of a particular authority.

In Slough and in Berkshire we are faced with the conundrum that Berkshire county council, which has consistently spent below its GREA, has lost grant year after year. Under my right hon. Friend's latest proposals, if it spent at GREA in the coming financial year it would be £9 million worse off than if it had spent at GREA in the current financial year, while the borough of Slough has had its rate support grant increased from £1 million to £4·5 million during a period when the Labour-controlled council has trebled the borough's rates. For the minority of my constituents who are ratepayers there is some compensation from the fact that, as the county has lost grant, the borough has gained, but it is only partial compensation, because my Labour-controlled borough council uses the grant to spend more rather than to pass on the benefit to ratepayers in the form of lower rate bills.

There is an urgent need to scrap this completely discredited block grant machanism. It is a leaky old tub that has needed to be patched up so many times that it is now difficult to identify which are the patches and which is part of the original structure. It does not require any further patching; it requires scrapping.

The Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" contains proposals for a new grant system that is designed to help to improve local accountability and to provide a simpler and more stable system to assist local authorities with their financial planning. As other hon. Members have said, this is a matter of considerable importance. The proposal is that there should be two elements of grant—a needs grant, to compensate authorities for the higher costs which some of them face in delivering services, and a standard grant, which would be distributed on a simple per capita basis. I hope that the weighting of the grant distribution will be mainly towards the standard grant.

By and large, the costs of local authority services are related to population. Across a local authority area, such as a county, distribution on a population basis provides a reasonable measure of the need to spend. Whether one has a large number of elderly people, or a large number of children, there are needs to be met through expenditure, albeit by different services. A per capita system meets those needs. Similarly, in the more rural parts of a county, additional costs arise because of sparsity of population, whereas in the more built-up and densely populated urban parts of a county, such as my constituency of Slough, additional costs arise because of the concentration of population. However, if one takes the county as a whole, those factors even out. Probably, therefore, only a small needs element is required to reflect the exceptional additional costs that are borne by some authorities which diverge too far from being a microcosm of the country as a whole. To distribute as much as possible on a per capita basis would be both fairer and more readily understood by the electorate, and it would have the effect of strengthening the accountability of authorities to their electors.

The changes in the grant distribution mechanism could be enacted separately from the legislation that would be needed to scrap domestic rates and introduce a community charge. I do not believe that the two parts of local government finance are inextricably linked. Those who have doubts about the community charge, such as my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, might agree that as a first step this is one way in which it would be possible to move to a different basis for distributing the rate support element. There is a more urgent need for reform in that area than perhaps there is in the wider aspects of local government finance reform, although I remain firmly committed to and firmly support all the Government's proposals.

I should like to see the community charge introduced as soon as possible, because it would strengthen accountability and ensure that every adult living in the area of a local authority would have to contribute to the cost of the services that he uses. It would move us away from the system in which those who demand and use the services can be entirely free of sharing any of the burden of financing them. I shall certainly not be satisfied until my right hon. Friend comes to the House with proposals for a thoroughgoing reform of local government finance. Ratepayers in Berkshire and in other areas adversely affected by the present system should not be burdened one day longer.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): My hon. Friend has unrivalled experience in running a difficult Greater London borough and I should like to put on record my admiration for the way in which he ran that borough for many years. For that reason, it would be interesting to me and to the House to hear his opinion of the way in which the new rating system might affect businesses.

Mr. Watts: Perhaps that is slightly outside the scope of the Bill, but insofar as as I can I shall respond to my hon. Friend. The uniform business rate proposed in the Green Paper will generally be beneficial to business, because it will provide certainty about the level of contribution which businesses will be required to make towards the cost of local authority services. The rate at which that tax can be increased will also be limited through indexation. It will put an end to the anomaly of two identical businesses on opposite sides of the road, one luckily in Wandsworth and the other unhappily in Lambeth, one of which pays two or three times as much as its competitor.

Generally the effect will be beneficial, but during the transition, especially in the south-east, one must expect rateable values to rise as a result of revaluation. There must be some dampening of the effects if an additional substantial burden is not to fall on businesses over a fairly short period. As a long-term reform it will be beneficial and will certainly remove from Labour authorities the opportunity to treat the business ratepayer as a milch cow.

I eagerly look forward to the day when my right hon. Friend comes to the House with his full package of reforms. However, I suspect that that day is still some way off and I urge my hon. Friends to consider whether it would be possible to bring forward the rate support grant element of the reform so that ratepayers in Berkshire and in the areas of some other local authorities, mainly in the home counties, with high rateable values, and which are penalised year after year by this pernicious block grant system, can be relieved of that burden and no longer be subject to this discredited and unfair system.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): This Bill says as much about the Government's apparent conception of the functions of Parliament in passing legislation as it does about the web of complications which now form the system of local government finance. The Government appear to hold the view that legislation and the introduction of law is almost entirely about the imposition of the prejudices of Ministers on individuals and organisations, whereas the majority of our people still harbour what the Government may regard as a rather quaint and outdated view, that the law has something to do with justice.

As clear a view as may be found that the Government are more concerned with prejudice and political dogma than with justice can be obtained by an examination of the Government's record in the area of local government in general and local government finance in particular. In the very first point of the Bill, the explanatory and financial memorandum says:

"Relevant expenditure and total expenditure, which are essentially elements of the rate support grant and rate limitation systems in England and Wales, have been calculated in a way which conflicts with the legislation concerned."

The Government might have been a little more economical with words because all that means is that the legisation is not in accordance with the law or, to put it another way, it is illegal.

The Government and their supporters have had a lot to say about law breaking in the area of local government finance. The surcharging and disqualification of councillors who were said to have broken the law was greeted by gloating and much amusement by Conservative Members. What crime did the councillors commit? They supported a policy that was designed to delay the setting of a rate in the full knowledge and belief at the time, and having been advised to the effect, that such a course of action was entirely legal. However, judges subsequently decided that their actions had not been entirely legal and they were surcharged and disqualified from office.

Conservative Members added insult to injury by hurling abuse and accusations of disrespect for the law with a venom that only they are capable of harbouring and which has poisoned their minds against our local government system. But what is the attitude of the same Members, the same Government, when some of their own friends are found — not for the first time — to have broken the law? There are no cries of horror now, no pontificating about the sanctity of the law, no statements the law must be obeyed and that no one is above the law. We had no paternalistic reminders that ignorance of the law is no defence.

When councillors were surcharged and disqualified, their defence that they thought that they had been acting legally was dismissed. Yet when a former Secretary of State for the environment, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) admits in this House:

"I have spent £30 billion of taxpayers' money illegally."—

he is allowed to make a joke of it.

What is the response of this Government of law and order, the self-professed protectors of justice and fair treatment for all? The Secretary of State for the Environment said to the right hon. Member for Henley:

"I thought for a moment that my right hon. Friend was going to offer to pay. I assure him that I would not suggest that for one moment. I do not suggest that we should apportion blame in this matter. There has been a distinction between what people thought the law was and what it is. We can easily put that right".—[Official Report, 16 December 1986; Vol. 107, c. 1055.]

Of course this Bill is designed to do just that, to legalise what was previously illegal in order to get Tory Ministers off the hook, while for less serious and certainly far less expensive breaches Labour councillors are branded as blatant law breakers.

Mr. Watts: Is the hon. Gentleman arguing that the law should remain as it is, which is not as it was thought to be? If he is, does he not accept that he is arguing that every settlement made under the 1980 Act should now be undone? Does he not accept that that would lead to chaos in local authorities because there would be uncertainty not just about the coming year's rate support grant, but about everything that has happened for the last five years?

Mr. Clelland: I am pursuing an argument which outlines the Government's hypocrisy and double standards. Later in my speech I shall tell the hon. Gentleman how the Bill itself will cause considerable chaos in some local authorities.

Far from being a protector of the law, the Tory party manipulates, uses and abuses the law in order to pursue its own narrow political prejudices and as a weapon against its political opponents.

On average, one Act of Parliament during every year of the Government's term of office has concerned the financing of local authorities and each Act has claimed to clarify, improve or otherwise enhance the system.

Although it could be argued with some justification that measures must be taken to shield local authorities against the possible consequences of the Government's illegality during the past few years, this latest Bill only serves to emphasise the way in which local services are being made to pay for increased central Government expenditure and the increased centralisation of power. To justify their actions, the Government make spurious accusations of overspending and profligacy.

However, to put it simply and to deal with the generality rather than with the specific point that was made by the hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess), what has happened is that whereas in 1979-80, £61 of every £100 of local authorities' relevant expenditure was met by the rate support grant, today only £46·40 of every £100 is provided by the Government. Therefore, to spend the same £100, local people have to contribute £54 in comparison with the £39 that they were expected to contribute in 1979. That is an increase of 35 per cent. in the local contribution without one penny increase in expenditure.

Add to that the effects of inflation, the continuing and increasing demands and the increased expenditure arising from Government legislation, and it is not hard to see why rates have increased while services have suffered, and why the areas with the greatest need have had to suffer the greatest increase in rates to protect services and continue with such improvements as they can. The fact that many of those councils are in the north should come as no surprise, especially given the latest reports on the north-south divide. Only two or three weeks ago, the Prime Minister denied that that divide existed. Of course, we know now that the divide exists and we also know that the Government's policies have aggravated and accentuated it.

The divisions are also evident in local government finance. Indeed, only a few short weeks ago, the Secretary of State for the Environment announced what he called "new guidelines" based on what he said was "more up-to-date information" for the distribution of Exchequer grants to local authorities. His "more up-to-date information" was apparently gleaned following representations from Tory-controlled councils and his "new guidelines" meant losses of about £20 million to the northern regions and a gain to the likes of Surrey, Hampshire and Bedfordshire.

Nowhere in the Bill is there any recognition of the existence of the seriousness of the north-south divide or any sign that the Government intend to do anything other than continue to undermine local government finance and accountability. They undermine local finances by the restrictions and legal entanglements contained in legislation such as is proposed, and by setting limits on expenditure which are based on complete ignorance of the real needs and priorities of an area. They undermine accountability by interfering with the priorities as they are perceived by locally elected representatives, and by replacing elected bodies with appointed boards and, in too many cases, political sympathisers.

If local government means anything, it means the right of local people to build and develop their communities in their way. The Government have eroded those rights and prevented local communities from raising their finances and deciding their priorities. In so doing, they have transferred power from local people to the Secretary of State for the Environment who now has, as the Bill confirms, dictatorial power to decide the financial fate of local councils and, in consequence, the standards and levels of essential services as well as the employment prospects of thousands of ordinary people in the public and private sectors.

The Bill should be rejected by the House for the ill-conceived, hastily drafted and dictatorial measure that it is, as well as for the very good reason that it threatens even further cuts in jobs and services in many inner-city areas. I am concerned especially about the effect that it will have on the northern region in general, and on Newcastle and Gateshead in particular. Both authorities, despite being recognised as areas deserving special assistance through inner area partnership, are rate-capped by the Government. The expenditure levels that were proposed by the Secretary of State last year were totally inadequate to meet the existing needs and current levels of service let alone to allow any improvement.

The new proposals in the Bill take no account of the real needs of the two councils and, indeed, clearly show that the representations made to the Secretary of State on 24 November 1986 by my hon. Friends the Members for Gateshead, East (Mr. Conlan), for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) and me, together with members and officers of Gateshead council, fell on deaf ears. Of course, it is now clear that even as we faced the right hon. Gentleman across the table in Marsham street, he was fully aware of the proposals to be brought forward in the Bill. Yet he allowed the Gateshead representatives to travel all the way down to his office—at a not inconsiderable cost in money and time—knowing that their journey could achieve nothing. Like the hon. Members who represent Newham constituencies, we wasted our time in seeing the Secretary of State.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he has just said. What was the date on which he and his colleagues came down from Gateshead to visit the Secretary of State?

Mr. Clelland: The date was 24 November 1986, two months after the Secretary of State, as he told us this afternoon, was aware of the problems in the legislation.

My hon. Friends and I put the case clearly and forcefully, to the Minister, saying that his proposals would mean a shortfall in excess of £10 million in Gateshead's finances as a result of the special accounting arrangements of the previous year. He accepted that by agreeing to meet us in the first place. However, he has not taken on board one of those points. In the Bill he proposes a formula which will force a reduction in the council's revenue needs of more than 12 per cent. or £12·5 million in 1987-88.

I put it to the Secretary of State—at least I should have done so had he been here to listen—and to the House that there is not an organisation in this country which, having been squeezed to the limit, could make reductions of that magnitude without serious and harmful effects on those who rely on it for services or employment, or both. For those reasons and for others that have been put forward by my right hon. and hon. Friends and others, I urge the House to reject the Bill.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): I must confess that I gulped when I saw the Bill. On the basis of what the Secretary of State told us on 16 December last year, I expected a modest little Bill which would make lawful the illegal expenditure of £60 billion and put the law back to what we had all previously thought it had been. If that had been the case, we could have had a little bit of fun tonight scoring a few party political points, and then we could all have gone home.

However, the Bill is not like that at all. It is one of the most extraordinary Bills that a Secretary of State has ever attempted to put on the statute book. In bringing it to the House the Secretary of State has shown the sort of regard for the laws of the country that one would expect of a member of the Italian Mafia for the laws of that country.

The Bill is written as though the courts do not exist and as though there is no such thing as the rule of law. At a stroke the Bill wipes out administrative law over an entire area of local government finance. The Bill makes it clear that the Secretary of State sees the laws as a pestilential nuisance to be swept aside by the arrogance of the present Conservative majority. It is based on a philosophy that is deeply and profoundly offensive to the democratic process, and it enshrines in statute the proof that in the late 20th century Conservatism and authoritarianism have become synonymous in this country.

Extraordinarily, the Bill creates a regime in which it is deemed, not only that the Minister knows best, but that he knows everything. He can do what he likes under the Bill and can even say what is, and what is not, expenditure. When the Secretary of State uses a word, he says that it means what he says it means, neither more or less. No matter how stupidly, unfairly, arbitrarily, ridiculously, perversely or viciously he acts, the courts cannot intervene and they cannot review his actions. The courts cannot consider unreasonable behaviour, maladministration, negligence and brazen political chicanery. I cannot remember a Minister coming before the House with such a Bill.

Indeed, the Bill sets out to make a complete ass of the laws of the country. I ask the House to consider the position of the London borough of Hackney in relation to redetermination. Thanks to the Secretary of State, the entire process has been a judicial farce. The London borough of Hackney did not intend to apply for redetermination, but it was taken to the courts by a ratepayer. After a protracted, expensive action, it settled. Queen's counsel then told the council, "You must apply for redetermination because it would be wholly unreasonable for you not to do so." At precisely the moment when Queen's counsel was telling the London borough of Hackney that it should apply for redetermination, and at a time when no law had changed, the Secretary of State for the Environment stood at the Dispatch Box and said that there would be a formula. He said that there would be no such thing as redetermination because it would be unlawful.

How, in a sensible society which believes in the rule of law, can Queen's counsel insist that it would be wholly unreasonable not to ask for redetermination while the Secretary of State insists, under the same laws, that it will become unlawful to ask for redetermination? Either we have an insane Minister who should be carried away by the men in white coats, or we have the politics of "Alice in Wonderland." "Off with his head!" "But he does not have a head." "Then he will not mind it coming off, will he?" What sort of politics are we engaging in? The Secretary of State comes to the House and says—he did so today—"All that we are doing is making the law what we thought it was before." In many respects that is manifest nonsense, and it will damage boroughs such as Hackney.

Before we started to debate the Bill, resources were calculated on the basis of expenditure levels, balances and the product of a penny rate. Now all that has been swept aside and resources will be calculated on rateable value. Everyone knows that in a borough such as Hackney rateable value will produce more resources than will the product of a penny rate. That is a major change from which Hackney will suffer.

Clause 4(3) says that the Minister will determine rate support grant on the basis of information given before the latest supplementary report. If more accurate and up-to-date information becomes available, the Minister will ignore it. What an extraordinary state of affairs. If the Minister ignores such new information, the London borough of Hackney could lose about £2 million. In 1984-85 it entered into joint financing arrangements with the district health authority on behalf of the DHSS. Before the latest supplementary report the estimate of disregards was £10·75 million, but now there is more up-to-date information. The outturn of disregards is £12·25 million. Therefore, the poorest borough in Britain faces a potential loss of £2 million because of delays by a Government Department and because of this legislation. It is unbelievable.

I give the analogy of two people taking an examination. The first person writes a brilliant paper in immaculate prose. He spends all his allotted time—three hours—doing that paper. The second person writes a dreadful paper in almost incomprehensible English, but he hands in his paper after three quarters of an hour. The Secretary of State for the Environment says, "I will fail the first person, who did so brilliantly and used immaculate prose, and I shall give a first-class honours degree to the second person, who produced such rubbish written in incomprehensible English, because he handed me his paper first." That is nonsense, and for the Government to allow a local authority to lose millions of pounds on that basis defies comprehension.

On 16 December the Secretary of State made it clear that, in his view, it was unlawful to make a rate fund contribution to a special fund if that led to a deficit on the rate fund. He wrote to some authorities about that, but he did not write to the London borough of Hackney, so it is not concerned with the warnings that he mentioned today. But Hackney has a major problem, and I ask the Minister who will reply to the debate whether he can solve the conundrum created by the Bill.

In 1982-83 the London borough of Hackney set up a special fund. In 1983-84 no contributions were made to that special fund, but a deficit was incurred in that year. If it is unlawful to make a rate fund contribution to a special fund which results in a deficit, is it unlawful to have a special fund which is in credit in a year in which a deficit arises? If it is not unlawful, can the Secretary of State—from my reading of the Bill, I suspect that he can—deem it to have been unlawful? If he can perform that absurd trick, Hackney will lose a further £4 million. Therefore, under a Bill which, apparently, will make no difference to what has gone before, the poorest borough in Britain could suffer a loss of £6 million in rate support grant.

Tomorrow we shall discover by how much the Government will expect Hackney to cut its expenditure. I shall not guess now, but it could be about £15 million. Perhaps the Minister can tell Hackney how it can fulfil the statutory obligations that it is barely fulfilling now because it cannot spend enough money on them.

At the general election the Labour party will be targeting two key Government figures. One will be the chairman of the Conservative party, the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), especially after his statement, which apparently he denies having made, that no one with a conscience would vote Conservative. The other person will be the Secretary of State for the Environment. Together, they represent the Right-wing loony tendency of the Cabinet. The epigram with which the Secretary of State leaves the House and the country is that no one with a respect for the rule of law could ever again vote Conservative.

7.57 pm

Sir George Young (Ealing, Acton): I listened with interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore). He destroyed a potentially good case by exaggeration—a tendency to which he has resorted before. Of course there are problems in Hackney, and no one who knows the borough would deny it, but if he cares about a solution to those problems I hope that he will exhort the local council to pursue more vigorously partnership with the private sector in housing and in jobs. I hope that it will take up more enthusiastically the money that is on offer from the Manpower Services Commission, the youth opportunities programme, and the rest, and that it will examine how the town hall is run to see whether some economies can be made there.

I support my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I do so with a twinge of sympathy, because whoever is to blame for the fact that we must have the legislation, it is certainly not him. Indeed, he has borne with fortitude the burden of getting the Bill through the House.

There has been a consensus in the House that if ingenious loopholes have been disovered by a minority of local authorities, which have disadvantaged the remainder, it is perfectly legitimate for any Government to try to stop those loopholes. In response to an intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) conceded that.

There has also been consensus on the legitimacy of clarifying matters if it emerges, as it has, that what we all thought was the case turns out not to be so. I am a vice-president of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and I have received its briefing, which says:

"The Association is anxious that the distribution of Rate Support Grant is put on a proper legal footing."

There is an element of consensus and I shall develop the differences in a moment.

Mr. Tony Banks My hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) made it quite clear that he did not accept that there had been abuse. The hon. Gentleman must be clear about that. My hon. Friend said that that was what was being said by Conservative Members and that local authorities might well have been able to find loopholes. That is rather different from abuse.

Sir George Young: If the hon. Gentleman reads what I have just said, he will find that I said that there was consensus in that, if ingenious loopholes had been opened up and used by a minority, it is perfectly legitimate for the Government to put that right. I was in the Chamber when the hon. Member for Copeland disagreed with the statement that it was an abuse. I am trying to identify the consensus before demonstrating the differences.

The differences are based on the argument that the Bill goes further than building on the consensus, removing abuses and clarifying the law. The AMA's case goes further, and I should like to consider its objections and those of Opposition Members.

The AMA complains that the Bill is too complex and difficult to follow. I am a non-lawyer and find all legislation complex and, having dealt with some local government legislation, I have to say that it is no exception. All local government legislation on rate support grant is complex. It follows inevitably that when one tries to impose a new interpretation on existing legislation, it will be complex. Although the Bill might be complex, that is not a legitimate reason for hon. Members to vote against it, as invited to do by the AMA.

The next complaint concerns the powers being given to the Secretary of State. The AMA complains that the Bill goes further than it need in that regard. The Bill has to address the Secretary of State's powers to replicate the existing provision. The Bill redefines the Secretary of State's powers in the light of the information to which my right hon. Friend referred. My understanding is that the definition does not tilt the overall balance away from local authorities towards the Secretary of State, which is the charge that has been made. It simply replicates what exists at the moment. I reject that argument against the Bill as well.

The AMA complains about "proper practices" and says in its briefing:

> "It seems unsatisfactory to place so much emphasis in this Bill on 'proper practices', when those practices are not defined."

I understand that the Bill does not define proper practices because the Government do not intend to dictate to local authorities what their accounting practices should be. As much of the criticism of the Government is that they interfere too much, it is a little inconsistent to criticise them for not defining proper practices.

The AMA objects to the legal protection being given to the Secretary of State. The Bill affords protection, but hon. Members have gone slightly too far in their interpretation of what that protection is. The protection applies to the Secretary of State and future decisions of the courts, but only future decisions in respect of decisions by the Secretary of State that have already been taken. It does not give immunity in respect of future decisions. That is a much narrower definition of legal protection than has been given by some hon. Members.

The AMA objects to clause 5, which concerns intermediate areas, and alleges that it could mean grant losses for several local authorities. If some local authorities lose grant, I understand that that is because they have abused the existing conventions. It is only right that the majority of local authorities, which have observed those conventions, should not be penalised as a result of the activities of a minority. If they incur grant losses, I am sure that the decision can be defended.

The AMA's final range of complaints concern rate capping—clauses 7 and 8 and schedule 2. If we are to get a rate from rate-capped authorities by 1 April, the procedures to which they would have been entitled have simply to be compressed. If they were not compressed, the authorities would not be able to fix a rate by the date laid down in law. This is a provision for just this year. In 1988 all the existing procedures will be observed. It is a temporary suspension of some procedures, and entirely necessary if local authorities are to fix a rate by the necessary date.

I am conscious of my responsibilities as a vice-president of the AMA, but I did not find its briefing wholly persuasive and I intend to vote in favour of the Bill.

Several hon. Members have said that if only we had a slightly better system to distribute rate support grant we would not need this rather complex amending legislation. Nobody is more in favour of a simplified rate support grant procedure than I am. I confess that, despite having spent some five years in the Department of the Environment, I never fully grasped the intricacies of RSG. Each time an official tried to explain it to me I found that such grasp as I had was beginning to weaken and I had to invite the official to stop, in case I discovered that I did not understand it at all. I understood the housing aspects of RSG, however, for which I had ministerial responsibility.

There is a dilemma here. If we have a simple system, the chances are that it will not be very fair, and that if we have a fair system, it will be extremely complicated because it has to reflect all the differences in needs and resources of local authorities. Given a choice between simplicity and equity, I plump for equity.

I listened with interest to speeches which commended the new system of a uniform business rate and a community charge. If we do that, we are still left with the problem of how the Government distributes their share of the grant. Community charge simply replaces the domestic rate with another system and does not finance local authorities in their entirety.

I believe that we will be left with a fairly complex RSG system. I voted with enthusiasm for the new system, which is to be introduced in Scotland, but I remain agnostic about its extension to England. I should like to see it up and running in Scotland before I decide whether it is the answer to all the problems associated with funding local government.

The London borough of Ealing is one of the local authorities which is affected by the provision on intermediate years in clause 5. Ealing is not rate-capped this year and many ratepayers hope that it will be rate-capped for 1988, in view of the authority's decision to go ahead with expenditure plans which look like putting the rates up by some 60 per cent.

There is a dilemma between giving local authorities and ratepayers more responsibility and the legitimate reaction that the Government should protect ratepayers from local authority abuses. Rate capping seems to be the right solution in the few cases when authority is abused.

In November I wrote a letter to the leader of the Labour party, who lives in Ealing, pays rates in Ealing and voted for Ealing council. I asked him fairly straightforward questions — whether he endorsed Ealing council's decision in five areas. Nearly two months later, I am still awaiting a reply. It is uncomprehensible that the leader of the Labour party, with all the resources available to him, finds it impossible to respond to a letter from another Member of Parliament on a matter as sensitive as this. Whatever influence the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) has, I hope that he will use it to persuade his leader to answer that letter. Having said that, I will, with enthusiasm, vote for the Second Reading of the Bill.

8.10 pm

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): As my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) showed in his intervention, and as I shall seek to show in a few moments, the hon. Members for Slough (Mr. Watts) and for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) have completely misunderstood the true nature of the Bill.

I do not blame the hon. Gentlemen for any misunderstanding because they have been misled and misinformed by the Secretary of State for the Environment who has misled the House in three important respects—in his statement on 16 December and in his speech today. I do not say that he has misled the House deliberately. Any such allegation would be out of order. However, as I listened to the Secretary of State for the Environment I became increasingly convinced that he does not understand the existing legislation and that he does not understand his proposed legislation. As a result of his misunderstanding, he has misled the House of Commons.

I shall be specific. First, in his statement on 16 December, the Secretary of State for the Environment sought to persuade the House that he is proposing to make a minor change to deal with "a highly technical problem". Those were his very words. He said:

"The Bill will simply seek to return to the legal position that everybody, including all local authorities,"—

I emphasise the words "all local authorities"—

"thought existed. It was the Government who spotted the error, so the credit should go to the Government for having identified a legal weakness and for having sought immediately and honourably to put it right." — [Official Report, 16 December 1986; Vol. 107, c. 1054.]

That statement was not true. The city of Birmingham council had a totally different understanding of the law as it existed before and as it exists now, before this Bill becomes an Act of Parliament. It is now clear that the city of Birmingham council was right, and that is why we have the Bill. The city of Birmingham council understood the law as it was and is, and it was the Secretary of State for the Environment—and quite possibly some other local authorities—who misunderstood the legal position.

The Bill is not intended to return to the legal position as it was understood to be; it is not intended to return to the legal position as it is; it is intended to return to the legal position as the Secretary of State says that it is, and there is a very big difference.

I followed the speech of the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton, with great interest, and I agreed with many of his earlier remarks. The hon. Gentleman used the word "abuse". He used the word in two contexts and tended to confuse its meaning. In the first use of that word, he was referring to those local authorities which had engaged in what he described as abuses in their accounts. As my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) explained at the Dispatch Box today, the city of Birmingham council did not engage in any abuse. It made expenditure which it was entitled to make, and which was regarded as expenditure for the purposes of grants and in line with current law. That is not an abuse.

I must tell the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton that I thought it was common ground between all parties in this House that all individuals, companies and councils are entitled to arrange their affairs according to their own judgment of what is to their advantage under the law as it is at the time of taking those decisions. It is not right to describe those decisions as abuses, and it is not right to legislate retrospectively to change the law. That is one of the points that is wrong with this Bill, and one of the points on which the Secretary of State has misled the House of Commons.

I come to the second point of misinformation. The Secretary of State, in his speech today, said that no change was proposed for previous years, but that is not correct. The Bill will make it possible for the Secretary of State to change the definition of expenditure for previous years, and that is retrospective legislation.

The hon. Member for Slough, who has served on several Standing Committees dealing with Finance Bills, evaded the challenge from my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South, who asked him to say on what occasion any Chancellor of the Exchequer, in this Government or in any previous Government, had legislated retrospectively on a tax matter and changed the law as it applied to a decision taken in the past.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) said from the Dispatch Box, it is common practice to change the law regarding tax with effect from the time that the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes a statement, but he does not change it retrospectively. If people have succeeded — through what some hon. Members have called ingenuity, but what in truth can be described as a correct understanding of the law—in maximising their income, which every individual or council is entitled to do, then it is wrong to change the law retrospectively to reduce that income. That is what the Government are doing. They are retrospectively invalidating expenditures that were made by some councils; expenditures that were made legally by those authorities as far back as 1983-84. The decisions of those councils have, in many cases, been certified by the Audit Commission and private auditors. The city of Birmingham council had been certified by no less than Price Waterhouse, which wrote to the Department of the Environment and said:

"We have considered this issue in some detail and have concluded that the contribution is a lawful charge."

It cannot be stressed too much that the city of Birmingham council has not acted illegally and has not abused the law. It has acted according to the law as it was at the time of those decisions. Even worse, this Bill does not change the law in that respect; it gives the Secretary of State the right to change the law — to redefine expenditure. The Secretary of State is to be given the power to prescribe that certain items of expenditure will no longer count for grant purposes. He has written to the city of Birmingham council and given notice that he intends to change those definitions affecting the city of Birmingham as far back as 1984-85, and it has been calculated by the city treasurer that that will cost the city of Birmingham £8 million.

I tell my hon. Friends from the borough of Newham, who have spoken with such feeling about the effects of this Bill on their borough, that the city of Birmingham will lose more in absolute and proportionate terms than Newham from this decision. Indeed, I tell my hon. Friend the Member for Tynebridge (Mr. Clelland), who referred to changes in the proposed rate support grant settlement and to the northern region losing £20 million, that the city of Birmingham alone will lose £39 million as a result of the changes that were suggested in the third consultation document.

The third point on which the Secretary of State has misled the House today was when he described this Bill as having the objective of "the maximum certainty" for local authorities. It will not provide certainty for local authorities. The hon. Member for Ealing, Acton said that this Bill does not change the balance between central Government and local government. He is also mistaken and is misleading the House. This Bill changes the balance because it changes the powers of the Secretary of State. It gives the Secretary of State for the Environment the right to decide what is legitimate expenditure for a council to undertake and what expenditure will be taken into account in determining the rate support grant. That means that there will be uncertainty.

I have myself discussed this matter with the city treasurer in Birmingham, and he tells me that he is now totally uncertain about what advice to give a city council, on a non-political basis, about city finances, because he does not know what decisions the Secretary of State will take in the future to redefine what is and what is not legitimate expenditure for the city council. We will not know for five years after 1983-84 what was legitimate expenditure in 1983-84. The decision to refuse to validate all previous decisions up to the date of the Secretary of State's statement to this House on 16 December is deplorable. At the very least all retrospective proposals should be dropped from the Bill and all past decisions which have been certified as correct and legal by auditors should be accepted. How can any local councillor of any party now take a decision on the basis of knowing what the law is and what law will be applied to the decisions that he takes?

I come now to a point that is not in the Bill but which is a direct result of the Bill. As I have already pointed out to the House, the Bill gives the Secretary of State the right to take decisions which he has already told us will cost Birmingham £8 million. That is not the first such decision that we have had from the Secretary of State. Last year, the Secretary of State pushed through the House a Bill which became an Act of Parliament in the autumn and changed the basis of the rate support grant. That decision was taken and the Bill put through the House as a result of the city of Birmingham council going to the court and obtaining a judgment in its favour. The Secretary of State changed the law retrospectively to rob the city of Birmingham council of the legitimate fruits of its success in the court.

The Secretary of State believes that the law should be what he says it is, not what the judges say it is. As I have said before, I do not object to the Secretary of State proposing a change in the law for the future. All Governments are entitled to take that action. But I do object to any Government changing the law retrospectively and robbing a successful claimant of his award in a court of law. That cost the city of Birmingham £7 million.

Then there is the decision, foreshadowed by the third consultation document about the rate support grant, to reduce the rate support grant for Birmingham for the coming year by £39 million. That was the second such decision.

Now we have the third episode in the Secretary of State's vicious vendetta against Birmingham which will cost Birmingham £8 million.

At the very least, it is about time that the Secretary of State started to take legal advice from the solicitors who advise the city of Birmingham council. They have a better idea of the law than his advisers in the Box or in the Department of the Environment in Marsham street. If he came to Birmingham, we could tell him what the law is. But the Secretary of State will not accept what the law is. He prefers to change it retrospectively.

This is a bad Bill and we should all vote against it.

8.22 pm

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I am pleased to rise in support of the Local Government Finance Bill, particularly as I nominated Leicester city council to be rate-capped at the beginning in line with the Rates Act 1984. It was rate-capped and it was a worthy candidate for that.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) talked about abuses. There certainly have been abuses in local government, and that is a sad fact of life. That is why we need to keep changing the rating system, the rate support grant and other matters relating to the rates. Indeed, that is why, in the long term, we must abolish the present rating system and introduce the community charge. The ratepayers have been getting a raw deal and something must be introduced as quickly as possible.

In the meantime, I am particularly worried about the lack of any provision in the Bill for a clawback. A council like Leicester, which is rate capped one year can in the next year legitimately cause the rates to shoot to a new high level in order to claw back what it had hoped to receive in the first year but which it had been denied. That blatantly defeated the Secretary of State's will and I hope that it will be considered again.

Local government finance is complicated. I was present when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made his statement to the House on 16 December, when he said that he was the only one who fully understood the matter. I can fully appreciate the problems that exist. However, it is urgent that we should have a full and proper control of rates, once collected. That is where we are going wrong now.

The Bill will legitimise the rate-capping provision of the Rates Act 1984. Therefore, it will guarantee that Leicester was properly rate capped, signed and sealed. In the meantime, we must look at the accountability requirements before setting the rates. The Bill seems to provide no direct rules to ensure that all local authorities present to businesses in the area a proper consultation paper so that the business community can have a real say in deciding the level of rates. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts), I want to see one uniform business rate in the future, but in the meantime that accountability should be introduced into the Bill as soon as possible—I hope, in Committee.

There is no provision in the Bill for value for money. All councils should be fighting for value for money, whether in reducing their spendng on energy to provide more money for house repairs and some council house building. Some formula is required for that.

It is important that all local authorities should publish details of some of their nutty schemes. The amount of money that can be spent on any loony scheme should be part of the annual financial report, whether it be the Leicester city council's go gay policy, establishing a lesbian and gay unit, additional creches, twinning with Nicaragua or renaming the Welford road recreation ground the Nelson Mandela park. It is only right that such escapades, which are deeply offensive to my constituents, should be properly priced. Therefore, I welcome the provision for that in clause 1(4). I cannot, as yet, find in the Bill any particular requirements relating to partisan and political public relations, another costing that will need to come under clause 1(4).

It is a fact of life that in Leicester the chief executive's department is growing like Topsy. It is overmanned, overpaid and overspending. The Leicester Mercury, in an editorial a few days ago, highlighted the fact that a qualified assistant engineer would be paid about £11,200 a year, while a poverty low-pay officer would receive a minimum salary of £14,000, yet no real qualifications were specified for such a post. It is possible for a local authority to pay more for a political posting than for one which helps the entire community. An engineer would not be tempted at £11,000, while every citizen of Leicester will probably be tempted to become a poverty low-pay officer with a salary of £14,000.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Slough said earlier, steps must be taken in relation to creative accounting and deferred payments. Leicester should have been rate-capped last year — 1985-86 — and it should be rate-capped this year — 1986-87 — but, because of deferred payments and working closely with certain banks, it has got round the law. We want to see proper payments for local government. Certain local government Acts and Bills that have previously been brought before the House should now be legitimised. It is also clear that the rate limitation system can be made to work and can make local authorities sit up and realise that they cannot spend everybody else's money with impunity. Despite the introduction of the rate support grant and the rate limitation system some Labour local authorities have been able to scoot round the provisions and make the ratepayers pay in full the next year. There has been an excessive waste of ratepayers' money.

There is no doubt that there is no real voice for the business community. I appreciate that the Bill does not provide an opportunity for reintroducing the business vote, but that would have been the best way forward. Labour Members always argue that business men already have a vote wherever they live. However, most business men cannot afford to live in Leicester because their rates went up by 80 per cent. this year. Most have moved into the county, where the rates are considerably less. Labour Members may laugh, but those business men are the people who provide the real jobs in Leicester which are desperately required. It is depressing that they should move out into the county because they cannot afford the high rates.

I support the Bill, but I call for guarantees that we shall have value for money in the period up to the general election, for guarantees that once the Scottish dimension has been properly examined we shall get away from the current rating system and ensure that with the community charge there will be a just and equitable means for levying rates on all ratepayers.

It seems that wherever there is a Left-wing council, few people—only about 30 per cent.—pay rates. The rest are funded by the taxpayers. There is not a truly representative voice. High rates kill jobs and deny the opportunities for expansion.

The introduction to part II of the Bill says that it will have no effect on central Government manpower. I only wish that that were true of Leicester city council. The Labour council said that once rate limitation was introduced there would be a tremendous loss of jobs, but all that we have had is a massive increase in the number of jobs provided by the city council. The Bill might offer the council and the chief executive the opportunity to take on even more employees. That would be bad for the city's ratepayers.

The Bill is vital and will ensure that until we do away with the rating system ratepayers will have a voice. I urge Ministers at the Department of the Environment to look again at rate capping and at the needs of Leicester, where local people desperately want to see value for money. The scope of rate limitation should be widened to cover other councils and the district auditors should have more power. Councils have used deferred payments and other methods to get round the law, and action needs to be taken urgently. If we act now, ratepayers will be justified in voting Conservative in the May elections.

8.30 pm

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): The speech of the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) was illiterate in terms of comprehending what local government is about and the role that it plays in local economies and in the national economy. It was the hon. Gentleman's usual cloud-seven speech, drifting away into oblivion.

The so-called Left-wing council in Sheffield has been rate-capped under the Rates Act 1984. On 6 November a delegation from the Sheffield chamber of commerce and the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Sir J. Osborn) came to London to put to Ministers the case that Sheffield could not manage on the £259 million budget set by the Government.

It has been useful in the past two years to have the involvement of the chamber of commerce and the business community. They have discovered the disastrous situation facing local government finance and have said that it would be impossible to run a business in the manner in which the Government are asking local government to operate. The president of the chamber of commerce told its annual meeting that nobody could run Sheffield city council on the level of expenditure determined by the Government. That view manifested itself in strong representations that there should be a redetermination of the Sheffield budget.

A delegation from the local authority pressed its case on 25 November and on 17 November all Sheffield Members, including the hon. Member for Hallam, who is a Conservative, made representations to the Government. That was the day after the Secretary of State's statement to the House. We were told that the decision on redetermination would be known during the second week in January, but when we returned after the Christmas recess we found that the redetermination process had been flattened.

A case has been made by industry, commerce and the public representatives of all parties. Even the proposed Conservative amendments to the resolution passed by Sheffield city council called for a cut of only £15 million, compared with the £41 million cut that the Government are imposing.

People from Sheffield have come to London and tried to put the case to the Government. They were invited by the Government to put the case for redetermination, and the community put a lot of effort into making that case. It is deplorable that the Government's only response is to introduce a Bill stopping that sort of discussion.

The hon. Member for Leicester, East spoke about audits, and I remind him of what was said about the so-called Left-wing Sheffield city council. In February 1985 Mr. John Banham, the Controller of Audit at the Audit Commission, told the Institute of Housing conference that Sheffield was "well-managed". He said:

"Other cities could learn from Sheffield which provides outstanding value for money."

That authority has been vindictively attacked by the Government and is one of the most deprived areas in the United Kingdom. I represent the constituency with the highest youth unemployment in the United Kingdom. Our local authority will be denied resources for putting safety valves into the community and relieving some of the hardships. The council faces the impossible task of trying to run the city with a reduction of £41 million in its budget.

Sheffield has a major unemployment problem, particularly among young people, but it also has one of the largest aging populations in the United Kingdom. Those are serious problems, and the community wanted to put them before the Government, but we now face a potential 15 per cent. cut in the number of council employees—about 4,200 jobs. Bearing in mind that the council has responsibilities for some compulsory expenditure on, for example, the courts, cuts in other departments could total about 20 per cent.

The situation is desperate. I hope that the Government will accept what has been said by Labour Members. The Government have been advised to take certain legal manoeuvres to prevent consultations in the future, but I think that they should take further legal advice to find a mechanism to allow such discussions to continue. They should at least seriously consider amendments that will be proposed in Committee.

The north-south divide has been forcibly portrayed in the media over the past two or three weeks. If the Government continue taking resources from the north of England, and particularly from the inner cities, they will wreak havoc.

Much play has been made by Conservative Members of the legal manoeuvrings of local government. That complaint cannot be lodged against the joint boards in the areas of the disbanded metropolitan county councils. They have no reserves, because they are brand-new authorities. They could not have done any creative accountancy, because they were not there last year. There is no fat to lose, because nothing has been put into the coffers. We are talking about new authorities, yet some, like south Yorkshire, face rate capping.

To some extent, my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie) has mentioned the fire service. When we spoke last Friday to the chief fire officer for south Yorkshire, a black and dismal picture emerged. He is seriously concerned that he cannot meet the statutory obligations that have been laid down by the Home Office. It is all right for advisers and others not to take much notice, but they could be responsible for the deaths of people in south Yorkshire if the emergency services cannot come up to the minimum laid down by the Home Office. It is about time that there was a little more consultation between the Home Office and those who decide the expenditure levels.

During the past 12 months, transport has seen a 225 per cent. increase in fares, with 1,300 redundancies and a 10 per cent. reduction in the number of services. The Government have totally ignored our case for redetermination, and as a result we shall have £9 million less. That will mean a considerable number of redundancies. Moreover, the position on tendering will become very difficult. Indeed, the situation in south Yorkshire is desperate. The Government are creating more poverty. All the evidence shows that the north should be given support, but the Government are operating in the opposite direction and are vindictively starving south Yorkshire and, in particular, Sheffield of resources.

8.41 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): When the Secretary of State made his statement on 16 December, I acted from memory and reminded him that with regard to London Transport, the judge had said that charging Londoners extra millions of pounds was

"illegal, improper and administratively incompetent". — [Official Report, 16 December 1986; Vol. 107, c. 1055.]

The Secretary of State took exception to what I said, and I now wish to make a correction. Mr. Justice McNeill said that the Secretary of State had acted

"unlawfully, irrationally and procedurally improperly in giving a direction". — [Official Report, 19 February 1985; Vol. 73, c. 877.]

I am sorry that the Secretary of State is not in the Chamber, as he should attend the debate more. But it is little wonder that any local authority or citizen should put the worst possible interpretation on his actions and on the power that he is grasping for himself. When the Secretary of State made that statement, I said:

"Will he take into account the needs of inner-city areas such as Newham in his means and needs formula?" — [Official Report, 16 February 1986; Vol. 91, c. 1056.]

Of course, the Secretary of State did not reply to that.

Newham sent two deputations to the Secretary of State and his Ministers, and we have also heard from colleagues representing Sheffield, Birmingham and the north-east. I suggest that it was deliberately deceitful of the Government to give boroughs that sent deputations the impression that there would be a continuing redetermination at a time when the Bill was already being prepared. Indeed, as has been said, Ministers even saw a deputation the day after the statement had been made. If there had been provision in the Bill for adjusting the formulas in schedule 2, it might have been a different matter. But instead, the Secretary of State will say different things to different authorities at different times in respect of different times in respect of different times in the past and different times in the future. It is like Alice in Wonderland, only I think that she would have said, "I say what I mean and I mean what I say." No Secretary of State, supported disreputably by his right hon. and hon. Friends, has ever taken such overwhelming powers in order to overrule the legitimate judgments of the court.

I turn briefly to the determination of the grant and the capping formula in schedule 2. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) made it clear that Newham's standstill budget for the coming financial year would be about £190 million. The total expenditure permitted by the formula will be about £154 million. However, if the proper formula had been used to take account of the exceptional conditions prevailing, a fair figure would have been £167 million: about 10 per cent. over GREA instead of the 1·5 per cent. quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East.

I should like to ask the Secretary of State some questions, and if the Minister cannot answer them, I should like to be given a written reply. As the Minister comes from St. Andrew's house, I do not expect a reply now, although I expect him to be able to answer my sixth question. I should like the Secretary of State's signature to be on that reply. First, are the Government requiring Newham to make a 15 per cent. reduction in its expenditure? We all believe that to be the case. Secondly, if not, what is the figure? Thirdly, is there any greater reduction anywhere, and if so where, and what are the other reductions? I think that I am asking fair questions that should have been covered by the Secretary of State in his speech. Fourthly, were the figures given in the table that my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East mentioned, and which is now in the possession of the Secretary of State and his advisers, broadly correct? Fifthly, if the formula was amended to discount the effects of a difference of accounting on the base expenditure, would Newham be eligible for GREA plus 10 per cent., as shown in the manuscript amendments to that table which is in his possession?

I believe that answers to those questions should be given by the end of the week. Members of Parliament and the public in Newham require the Secretary of State to answer in his capacity as a Minister of the Crown and not as a dictator or would-be dictator.

I shall now ask my sixth question, and I hope that the Minister will reply to it. I shall pause in order to allow him to do so, as it is a reasonable question, and he should know the answer. Will the right hon. Gentleman agree to amend the formula in Committee to give Newham at least a GREA plus 10 per cent. figure? If the Minister wishes to intervene, I shall give way. If not, that question should be answered in writing as it is capable of a reply now.

There may be a solution to one of our major mysteries. Tonight, speeches have been made by hon. Members representing Essex and Berkshire. Each of them complained that the Government were dealing harshly and unjustly with them despite the harsh economies that they admitted that they had made. What reason can there be for a Conservative Secretary of State to take such steps? I am forced to draw an unwelcome conclusion, which is that the Secretary of State and those around him, including the Prime Minister, are bent on the destruction of local government as we know it in the United Kingdom. They are taking a leaf out of extra-parliamentary political books and are trying to push through a Bill when the House is half empty and the reporting level is not strong. That Bill will bring local government further into disrepute for reasons that it cannot prevent. The usual method of discrediting something that is wholesome is to generalise from the particular to try to persuade others that it is wrong when all the time it is the discreditor who is wrong. I believe that that is what the Secretary of State and his friends are trying to do. I shall say that inside and outside the House until the allegation is denied and some evidence is produced that it is not the truth.

The Bill is more likely to come from a political party of the extreme Right that does not believe in parliamentary democracy than from any other direction. It stems from views that we would expect from a Fascist and not from a Secretary of State who claims to favour parliamentary democracy.

8.50 pm

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): The Bill is vital, because without it we shall be faced with legal and financial chaos. The exaggerated rhetoric that we have heard from Opposition Members is unjustified. We have had to listen too often to speeches about the end of civilisation being nigh. They have claimed so often that the end of local government is nigh. The crying of wolf has gone on for rather a long time and we have ceased to believe them. They have failed to produce any concrete evidence to support their claims.

A number of justified concerns have been expressed this evening, however. Some of them are based on points of principle and some relate to the redetermination process. Surely it has emerged from the debate that there is an urgent need for a more lucid and comprehensible system of allocating resources between local authorities. The system is complex, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has accepted that. In global terms the allocations are understood only by the Almighty and two individuals. The Almighty is not communicating very directly with the Department of the Environment, and perhaps the reason for the lack of communication is the involvement of the Bishop of Durham.

One person who I understand fully comprehends the system is my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram), the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland. Unfortunately, my hon. Friend forgot about it the morning after the system was explained to him, and the gentleman who explained it to him and made him understand it is now a raving lunatic wandering around the bowels of Marsham street, and, if not there, in the Scottish Office, muttering that his GREAs and expenditure limits do not equate and, oh lackaday, that his block grant has declined yet again.

It is extremely difficult to understand what is going on and extremely difficult for local authorities to plan the basis of their future expenditure, and that is borne in upon us every time that we debate local government finance. The formulae are too complicated and relate to abstract national data which sometimes can operate quixotically from one authority to another. We need to have formulae that can relate more directly to the needs of individual authorities. Having established a set of formulae, we do not want the rapid changes which have taken place over many years in the allocation of resources. No sooner does a local authority think that it understands how much money it will receive than another factor changes the allocation of resources so that its financial planning is constantly nullified. We need greater stability and the formulae must bear a relationship to the needs of authorities. Surely it is not beyond the mammoth intellectual might of the Department of the Environment to set up a system that will give us a reasonably equitable base and annually make pro rata changes to that base.

Many references have been made to the way in which the Bill aborts or circumvents the redetermination procedure. Last year, with the establishment of joint boards, there was considerable hassle about the allocation of resources to police, fire and transport authorities. It seemed in the discussions that took place last year and early this year that we were beginning to overcome some of the problems, but everything has been put back into the melting pot. The result is a stream of problems as we consider parochially the allocation of resources.

I do not hold any brief for the West Yorkshire passenger transport authority, which has placed far too much emphasis on political point scoring rather than providing services for the general public of west Yorkshire, but it is not an inefficient wastrel, as some of the other authorities are or have been. Yet I accept that it has had difficulties. Some progress was made with the redetermination of its expenditure limit for this year but the consequence of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport agreeing to the redetermination was a loss of block grant, which meant that no financial benefits would be passed on to the ratepayers of west Yorkshire. When we compare the finances of the authority with those of others, we find that the amount of grant as a percentage of its expenditure limit is only 14 per cent. That is the lowest percentage of any passenger transport authority. The grant-related expenditure of Tyne and Wear as a percentage of its expenditure limit is 90 per cent. and in west Yorkshire it is 70 per cent. If we compare the block grant as a percentage of expenditure limit, it is 70 per cent. for Tyne and Wear and only 14 per cent. for west Yorkshire.

There is a series of disparities between passenger transport authorities and it seems that there is neither rhyme nor reason for this when one engages in a comparative exercise that embraces the fire, police and transport authorities in one metropolitan area with those of another. There are passenger transport authorities that have a higher proportion of expenditure covered by block grant than that of west Yorkshire and it is not possible to come to any rationale on which to base the transport services for west Yorkshire.

West Yorkshire has had great difficulty in understanding the present system and in trying to obtain a sensible redetermination. The situation is especially difficult for the West Yorkshire fire authority. Questions have been raised about its efficiency and I have been concerned to ensure that its resources are used as appropriately as possible. Bearing in mind the performance of other authorities and Home Office guidelines, it seems to be a reasonably competent authority, yet we were faced with the possibility this year in one stage of the redetermination procedure of a shortfall of £1·7 million in maintaining services at their current level. The difficulty that arose, when one examined the comparative figures, was that, of all fire bodies, west Yorkshire had the highest rate in the pound and next to the lowest level of total grant. It seems to be nonsense that the grant-related expenditure and the expenditure limit are determined at entirely different levels.

As the redetermination procedure progressed, we hoped that our representations to the various Departments would bear fruit and that we would be able, at the very least, to maintain our services in west Yorkshire at the current level. All of a sudden, just as some sense and coherence are entering the procedure, the Bill seeks to abort the basis of that redetermination application. Therefore, on the basis of the figures in the Bill, we will receive only half of what is required to ensure that current services are maintained. It is nonsense that where a relatively efficient authority, according to Home Office guidelines and a report of the chief inspector of fire services, needs additional resources to improve fire cover throughout west Yorkshire. The redetermination process has been stopped, to the considerable disadvantage of residents of west Yorkshire.

Would it not have been possible, instead of the algebraic formula in schedule 2 that resembles an O-level algebra paper, to enshrine in the Bill some more sensible, individual basis for redetermination? Instead of treating the authorities on a class-by-class basis, the legislation should seek to deal with some of the individual problems, such as those faced by the fire authority in west Yorkshire and the passenger transport authority.

I make two pleas to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in regard to the Bill. First, I plead that he use this opportunity to inject into the Bill a comprehensive, comprehensible, coherent system for 1987-88 that, as far as possible, will relate to the needs of individual authorities. My second plea is for a determined attempt to make sure that the system is more readily understood and simplified, primarily so that ratepayers and authorities may know from year to year on what basis they are to make their calculations.

9.1 pm

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): I wish to follow the remarks made by the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) about the effects of the Bill on transport and, in particular, on the fire service in south Yorkshire. It is time for the Secretary of State to look again at the problems that will be caused by the Bill. I do not like retrospective legislation. It smacks of Victorian attitudes. I admit that if there is something wrong with the law it must be put right, but it should be put right for the future and not retrospectively just to get somebody off the hook.

After objections were made about the cuts in the South Yorkshire fire service, the Home Office decided that an investigation should be carried out. The result was a minimum requirement for statutory cover.

I spent 12 years in the South Yorkshire fire service as a retained fireman. At the time, one of the things of which we in South Yorkshire were proud was the efficiency of the fire service and the ability of its personnel to turn out and to be at a fire within five minutes for category A and B fires, and within 15 minutes for category C and D fires. We prided ourselves on a three-minute turnout from all retained stations and from all full-time stations. We had a service that was second to none. We also had a highly qualified service. Therefore, we had a proud record. It was a record on which the public could depend.

The Bill seeks to stop the Secretary of State from redetermining the expenditure that has been allocated to the fire service. For the first time, fire cover in that area will be suspect. Thirty of 40 full-time men will probably be made redundant. Some already clapped-out appliances will continue in service. The fire service has not had a new appliance for the past two years. New appliances will certainly be needed in future. The old appliances that are being kept in use will need to have more and more money spent on them, to keep them in service. More than that, one has to consider the time when they will be off the road and out of the way.

Machines that should carry six men will carry four. Machines that should should carry four will carry three. Machines that should carry two will carry one. That will happen if the Bill is not altered. Those are not the local politicians' figures: they are the Home Office's figures. They are the statutory figures. One Department is saying what the minimum fire cover should be, yet the Secretary of State is making sure that it cannot be provided. An area is at risk. Two things are essential when a fire takes place. One is the quickness of the response, and the second is the efficiency of the service that responds. The amount of fire damage depends on the response. Every 15 seconds during the three minute turnout time, the damage increases tremendously.

It is no fault of the Government, but in south Yorkshire, ironically, since they came to power, the loss of life caused by fire has doubled. The call-out rate has increased from 10,000 to 15,000 calls per year. That is why I say to the Secretary of State, please look at the situation again, because he is putting that service into disrepute, but more than ever he is putting the people at risk.

9.7 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The hon. Member for Dewsbury was absolutely correct when he drew attention to the fact that hardly anyone can honestly claim to understand how local government finance works—[HON. MEMBERS: "It is Halifax."] I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. His constituency is Halifax.

Mr. Galley: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not confusing Dewsbury with Halifax because Halifax is a much more pleasant place than Dewsbury or even Newham.

Mr. Banks: I cannot believe that any place that the hon. Gentleman represents is more pleasant than Newham, but we shall pass quickly over that point.

Wherever he comes from, the hon. Gentleman was right to say that few can honestly claim to understand how local government finance works. Looking at schedule 2, one realises that the Secretary of State can hardly be described as Euclid, but I should be interested to see him try to explain to the House in words that even I can understand the way in which the formula will work, because it is gobbledegook. All that we know is that the impact on the borough of Newham will be horrendous. It is no surprise that the leader of Newham borough council, Councillor Jones, wrote to the Secretary of State and said that if we have to endure the cuts that are determined for us in the Bill, there will be social disruption on the streets of Newham. I cannot believe that even this Secretary of State wants that.

The Bill is grossly unfair. On 16 December the Secretary of State said

"the accepted approach . . . did not . . . correspond to the statute".

When the Secretary of State found that out, he merely brought in retrospective legislation to correct the position. Of course, this Secretary of State has been at odds with statutes before, certainly in the McNeill case. Whereas Secretaries of State can come to the House and inroduce retrospective legislation, when councillors try to do their best to protect jobs and services and find that they are acting in a way that does not correspond to the statute, they find themselves surcharged and driven from office. That is what makes the Bill so grossly unfair, and that is why I am delighted that the Labour Front Bench made it clear that the incoming Labour Government will abolish personal surcharge for local councillors.

If the Secretary of State's euphemism for law breaking was breathtaking, his claim in the same statement that he was was downright absurd. The right hon. Gentleman is the most arrogant and indolent of all Her Majesty's Ministers. He proved that when he came to the Dispatch Box, made a great dash for the post and clearly revealed that he did not understand the legislation to which he was asking the House to agree. He has no idea of what the law was or, indeed, will be, if the Bill is passed. We have already had a list of amendments correcting the mistakes in the Bill and that is even before we have had a chance to discuss it in Committee.

"the only person who is quite certain what the law is" —[Official Report, 16 December 1986; Vol. 107c. 1051-55.]

I still feel annoyed and aggrieved that at our meeting with the Minister in November where, as the Secretary of State correctly said, we were courteously received and we exchanged our views courteously, we were wasting our time. The Minister must have known that there was no chance of Newham's particular problems being considered in a particular fashion by the Government because the Bill would treat Newham within a class of local authorities. That means that the undertaki gs given during the Rates Act 1984 are meaningless. Redetermination was supposed to be about going to Ministers, spelling out local difficulties and Ministers making particular settlements. The Minister has still not said that I was misled in believing that our discussion with him was open, honest and genuine and that we stood a chance of reaching a better settlement for Newham than the present one.

The Bill legalises past illegalities and seeks to protect Ministers from future illegalities. It gives those same Ministers unrestricted powers to change the financial rules whenever they want to and without reference to Parliament. This may be our last chance to influence the Government. Thus, Ministers are drawing up the rules and then acting as judge, jury and appeal court in respect of those rules. What trade union or other organisation would the Government allow to do that? They would not. There is no semblance of democracy in the Bill. It reeks of Government authoritarianism and centralisation. It all but destroys local democracy in the rate-capped local authority areas. I am gravely worried about the impact that it will have on Newham when it becomes law.

This is an evil measure proposed by an evil and desperate Government. It will force local authorities to act illegally simply because by obeying the measure they will destroy their communities. Given such a choice, if local authorities defy the Government and refuse to do the Tories' dirty work, the responsibility will lie entirely with this most socially divisive, undemocratic and economically illiterate Government.

9.13 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): The debate has been characterised by excellent speeches from my hon. Friends the Members for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton), for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland), for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore), for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett), for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie), for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) and for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay). We would have had a speech from my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman), had she not had a baby girl on Saturday because this Bill seriously affects Southwark.

The Bill is about England, Wales and Scotland. Thirteen clauses apply to England and Wales and 2 two clauses, part II, to Scotland. The Under-Secretary of State for Scotland has been present during the debate, but no Scottish Member has spoken. There has not even been a representative from the Scottish Nationalist party. If there were a serious Scottish element in the Bill, an SNP Member would have been present. The only Scottish volunteer to grace our presence tonight is my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). The question arises as to why the Scottish Minister of State is to reply to this debate rather than the English Minister of State, the hon. Member for Brent, North (Dr. Boyson).

Mr. Meadowcroft: Charisma.

Mr. Straw: The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) may say charisma, but I suspect that it is a matter of the algebra at the back of the Bill in schedule 2, and the Government's wise judgment that the Scottish Minister of State can better deal with those complicated formulae than the English Minister of State.

On the face of it, the Bill is highly technical. It takes 17 clauses and 4 schedules simply to state what everyone had thought was already the law, or so the Secretary of State would have the House believe. We should not allow the technical nature of the language of the Bill to obscure from the House and the country the real significance of this measure. The 17 clauses and 4 schedules speak volumes for the incompetence and arrogance of the Government and for their refusal to respect the rule of law.

This time last year the House was in the throes of the Westland crisis. The central player in that crisis from the Government's point of view was the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) who was once the Secretary of State for the Environment. He started the Government down the road to local council chaos, although his successors as Secretaries of State had been all too willing to follow. When the present Secretary of State made his statement to the House about this Bill on 16 December, the right hon. Member for Henley sought to make light of his former responsibilities. He said in a question to the present Secretary of State:

"If I understand the thrust of a complex and technical statement by my right hon. Friend, it is that I have spent £30 billion of taxpayers' money illegally. If this judgment is right, I promise him my unswerving and urgent support for the legislation."

To which the Secretary of State replied:

"I thought for a moment that my right hon. Friend was going to offer to pay. I assure him that I would not suggest that for one moment. I do not suggest that we should apportion blame in this matter." — [Official Report, 16 December 1986; Vol.107, c. 1055.]

This indeed would be a laughing matter were it not so serious. All of us understand why the Secretary of State does not wish to apportion blame, as he has been a member of the Government throughout the past seven sorry years. But it is the job of this House to determine responsibility; and the responsibility for this farce lies not with officials, legal advisers or parliamentary draftsmen but firmly with Ministers. They cannot claim that they were not warned. The basic Act from which all this trouble flows was the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. That Act was conceived in chaos and it will be recalled by many of my right hon. and hon. Friends that the Bill had to be withdrawn from the other place and resubmitted to this place before it had been debated. Even when the second Bill was debated, the Government learned no lessons from their experience.

At that time, the Financial Times made a withering comment when the Bill finally received royal assent. In 1980 the Financial Times said that in block grant

"the Government took . . . principles into legislation before any work had been done to test them in detail. As Mr. King was promoting his principles in committee, horrified civil servants were discovering that the more detailed work they did, the worse the mire in which they found themselves."

We now know, continued the Financial Times:

"block grant will not be any simpler, will not be any more logical, and will also be full of extraordinary anomalies, and potentially unfair and discriminatory factors—all of which will need complicated, sometimes arbitrary, and often crude mathematical factors to iron them out."

We, too, have warned the Government during the passage of the 1980 legislation and on every occasion since. We warned them that the increasing centralisation inherent in their legislation would lead to increasing levels of incompetence. We reminded them time and again, of Karl Popper's famous dictum—that while it is easy to centralise power, it is impossible to centralise the knowledge needed wisely to exercise that power.

The defects that the Bill seeks to put right have not arisen as an accident of drafting but as a natural and inevitable consequence of Government policy. They have arisen as a result of the Government seeking to control that which they have no need to control — local authorities' current expenditure financed from their own resources. They have also resulted from the Government using, as an instrument of that control, block grant, for which purpose it was never, and could never, be designed.

In the far-off days of the last Labour Government, such was the consensus around local government finance that in two successive years, rate support grant orders were not even debated, and this decision was made not by the Government of the day but by the Conservative Opposition. Legal challenges to the allocation of the rate support grant were virtually unknown. The simple reason for that is that, while central Government may have sought to influence the levels of local government spending, they never sought to control it. The amount of a local authority's grant was therefore finite. Authorities were not penalised if they spent above some arbitrary limit, so, at the margins, block grant decisions did not have the critical effect that they now have on local authority spending plans and on the size of their rate bills.

All that has now changed. The Government have stumbled from one pit of their own making to another, even deeper. One control has been heaped on another. Alongside the administrative chaos that has been produced has been the Government's frenetic rhetoric about local spending, rhetoric which is oddly hollow and two-faced when we see that at the same time as the Government damn local authority spending, they take credit for the spending levels of local authorities.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): On education.

Mr. Straw: As my hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State for Education reminds us, the Government damn the spending levels of Labour local authorities while taking on themselves their education spending records.

When the Secretary of State made his statement, he said:

"There has been a distinction between what people thought the law was and what it is. We can easily put that right, and the House can then pass on to more important matters."

I hardly call 17 clauses and schedules easy. He also said that the Bill was "designed to make no changes in policy, but as far as possible to apply existing policy within a tight timetable."—[Official Report, 16 December 1986; Vol. 107, c. 1051-55.]

If that were the case, as my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) made clear, there could be little argument about the Bill. The truth is that the Secretary of State was less than frank, and came close to misleading the House. The Bill changes policy retrospectively in two key respects. Also, and more serious, it seeks to avoid the application of the rule of law and the supervision of the courts over the Secretary of State's decision.

Over the past four years, the House has had many opportunities to debate the occasions on which Parliament should retrospectively legislate. All are agreed that Parliament is sometimes justified in making lawful acts that were previously unlawful. No individual or institution is put at a disadvantage by such measures. We also acknowledge, although we may not agree, that sometimes it is necessary for Ministers to announce that, from a particular day, a particular transaction, usually of a financial nature, should be unlawful and that powers to provide for such unlawfulness would be sought and operate from the day of that statement, rather than the day of the Royal Assent. It was about such measures that there were many debates during the course of the abolition Act.

The Bill breaks new ground in local authority legislation. It seeks to make unlawful acts that have already occurred and which were done in the knowledge that at the time they were lawful. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) has given the House full details of the way in which the Bill will affect the city of Birmingham adversely. Many of us remember that in 1984, contrary to all the complacent predictions of the Conservative party, it was trounced in the local authority elections in Birmingham and the Labour party secured a famous victory.

The Conservative party has never forgiven the city of Birmingham for electing a Labour council. The Government pursued what can almost be described as a vendetta against that city. Last year the rate support grant Bill overturned a court case in which Birmingham had lawfully won an additional £8 million. Under the provisional rate support grant settlement, the grant gain has been taken away from Birmingham by rate capping amounting to £34·9 million. Under this Bill, Birmingham is denied another £7·5 million.

Trying to explain himself away, the Secretary of State said that these authorities would not have received this bit of rate support grant that is in contention in any event, but that is simply not the case. Transfers to special funds are crucial. A sum of money may be treated as expenditure in one year and income in another. Given the operation of the penalty system and the way in which the block grant has operated during the last seven years, the year in which such blocks of money are treated as expenditure and/or as income can have a significant effect upon an authority's block grant entitlement. The Department has always known that that is so. I can give evidence to the effect that sometimes the Department has advised authorities on how to maximise their block grant entitlement by shifting funds from one year to another.

Mr. Ridley: But if there were no funds and the funds that were shifted did not exist, then I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would be the first to agree with me that that was a fiddle.

Mr. Straw: Yes, but since we are considering Birmingham, what the Secretary of State has to explain is how it was that Price Waterhouse, the private auditors appointed by the city of Birmingham, said:

"We have considered this issue in some detail and have concluded that the contribution is a lawful charge."

Price Waterhouse did not say that it was a fiddle. It said that it was a lawful charge. Is the Secretary of State saying that Price Waterhouse failed in its professional duty? Has he reported Price Waterhouse to the professional bodies that are responsible for supervising accountants? Of course he has not. However, he has accused not just the city of Birmingham but Price Waterhouse of a fiddle. I give the Secretary of State an opportunity to withdraw.

Mr. Ridley: The Government would not have paid block grant upon the information that was available to them. If Birmingham or any other authority did not like that, it could have taken us to law. What is more, it would have lost.

Mr. Straw: The Secretary of State says that, what is more, Birmingham would have lost. I ask the Secretary of State to give Birmingham the chance to take him to court. Let us see who is right and who is wrong. Last year Birmingham took the Secretary of State to court and he lost. Therefore, the Government changed the law. If the Secretary of State is now inviting legal challenge from Birmingham, I am sure that Birmingham will be happy to accept his challenge. When the Bill is considered in detail, I hope that the Secretary of State will remove from it clause 4(6) and clause 6(4) so that Birmingham and other cities may be given precisely that opportunity. When the Secretary of State intervened he did not answer my point. He accused Birmingham and its auditors of a fiddle. On that point, he had better either put up or shut up.

The second way in which the Bill is wholly objectionable relates to rate capping. Three years ago, almost to the day, the Rates Bill, which gave unprecedented centralised powers to the Secretary of State, was given its Second Reading. We were told in this Chamber and in Committee that local authorities had no need to worry—that if the Government decided upon provisional expenditure limits, on the basis of their own information for individual authorities, which turned out to be wrong, individual local authorities would be able to offer information about their position and submit it to the Secretary of State and that not once but twice he would reconsider the matter and make a decision on the merits of the case submitted by individual authorities. For two years at least Secretaries of State have sought to judge authorities on the basis of individual merit. Not so now. The process of redetermination has been reduced to a farce by this Bill. Any consideration of the individual positions of local authorities has been abandoned. On 19 December I wrote to the Secretary of State on exactly this point.

Mr. Meadowcroft: The letter was in joined-up writing.

Mr. Straw: Indeed it was in my own hand. I asked the Secretary of State about the effect of this Bill on his discretion separately to determine the expenditure limits on certain authorities. He replied that there were standard formulae in the Bill and his letter went on to say:

"These formulae reflect my views and those of the appropriate Secretaries of State for the redeterminations, if any, which should be made to the expenditure levels which were determined in July 1986. Our views take account of all the information available to us . . . and the representations we have received since July, including representations made in support of redetermination applications."

Frankly, that reply was disingenuous, because it is plain from the Bill and from what the Secretary of State said earlier in this debate that the decisions contained in this Bill are different from the decisions that he would have made had he been exercising his discretion on the merits of individual authorities.

The Secretary of State said in answer to an intervention —I believe I quote him correctly—that the formulae in the Bill accurately, though not totally accurately, reflect decisions that he would have made on redetermination. Can the Secretary of State tell us the difference between accuracy and total accuracy in this matter? Will he provide the House with a schedule showing the decisions that he would have made had he made individual redeterminations in respect of each of these authorities? Is he willing to do that? I will allow him to intervene if he wishes to do so. He has admitted that there is a gap between accuracy and total accuracy. If the gap is significant, will he agree to amend the formula?

My hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) asked the Secretary of State if it was correct that paragraph 3(2) of schedule 2 gave the Secretary of State the power to revise the expenditure limits for any authority up to the point at which the Bill passes into law. I understand that the Minister of State is to reply to that point. If that is the correct reading of this sub-paragraph, and it appears to be, is the Secretary of State willing to use that discretion to deal with the very real problems that have arisen in Newham and in many other boroughs?

Mr. Spearing: Is my hon. Friend aware that the letter from which he has just quoted can hardly be correct and might even be categorised as deceitful because the table which I have supplied to the Minister and which I will supply to my hon. Friend shows that the range of GREA plus percentage to expenditure limit ranges from Basildon which is 70 per cent. above GREA to Newham which is 1·6 per cent. above GREA. How can the redetermination which the Secretary of State says he has taken into account produce such disparate percentages?

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct. These policy decisions are now produced through algebra and buried in a schedule. The circumstances of authorities vary dramatically. It is accepted that Newham is spending barely above the amount set by central Government, yet Newham's redetermination is no different from that of any other authority, regardless of the fact that circumstances are wholly different. But for this Bill, if Newham felt that it was being treated wholly unreasonably it could take the Secretary of State to court. That brings me to the most serious aspect of the Bill—its denial of the rule of law. I hope that Conservative Members who spent much time on the hustings preaching about the rule of law will look at what the Bill proposes and will agree that it is a constitutional monstrosity.

During the proceedings on the Rates Bill, Ministers tried to reassure us that they could not act capriciously or arbitrarily in exercising the wide discretion that they had been given because the wider rule of law required them to exercise that discretion reasonably and because, in any event, the courts would prevent them from making decisions for which they had no power. The judicial supervision of Acts of Government is central to any concept of the rule of law in a democracy, but under this Bill all that is cast aside. Clauses 4(6) and 6(4) state that they "shall have effect notwithstanding any decision of a court (whether before or after the passing of this Act) purporting to have a contrary effect."

One would expect such a statement only in an authoritarian, totalitarian and dictatorial regime.

The subsections state that the Bill shall have effect notwithstanding any decision of a court purporting to have a contrary effect. But the effect of the clause is not clear. It is not clear on the face of the clause what is being denied judicial supervision. What if an authority went to court to discover the effects of the clause over which the courts have no discretion? Will the Minister confirm that, since the Bill is so obscure, local authorities at least have the right to discover from the courts that over which the courts no longer have discretion so that, by subtraction, they can discover that over which the courts continue to have discretion?

Later tonight, there will be a motion to commit the Bill to a Committee of the whole House and to deny the House the detailed scrutiny of such a technical Bill that can take place only upstairs in Committee. That will be justified on the grounds that the matter is urgent, and I have no doubt that the subsequent threats of guillotine will be accompanied by a similar excuse. Those excuses will not wash, for the Secretary of State has admitted that he knew about this fandango and farce at least four months ago. We have had no explanation of why it took him three months to come to the House and four months to produce the Bill. Many Labour Members have every reason to believe that the Secretary of State deliberately delayed the matter for as long as possible to deny Parliament a proper scrutiny of the amending legislation.

This is a Bill born of the incompetence and arrogance of a Government who care little for local democracy and who know even less. They refuse to listen, not just to the Opposition and to Labour local authorities, but to Conservative local authorities and to those in the House who speak for them. Contrary to the Secretary of State's undertakings, the Bill contains policy changes. It legislates retrospectively to make unlawful decisions which, when taken, were lawful, at a cost of millions of pounds to some authorities. It removes the rights of the courts of this land to scrutinise legislation in a manner almost unprecedented in a democracy. It puts the Government above the law. It is a bad Bill, and we shall oppose it tonight.

9.38 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): We have had a very full debate on the Bill. From Conservative Members we have had a thorough appreciation of the logical reasons for the Bill and for their support of it. From Labour Members we have had synthetic fury laced with tortured sarcasm. We should have expected no more. It is a sign of the paucity of their arguments in the face of this legislation.

This is a highly technical Bill, the details of which will be considered fully in Committee. However, there is a simple principle behind the Bill: to maintain the status quo in the conduct of local government finance in the run-up to the major reforms which we propose, which were welcomed by many of my hon. Friends. This means continuing with the definitions of expenditure adopted in line with the wishes of local government in England, Wales and Scotland and providing, for England and Wales, for the rate support grant settlement and the rate limitation process to be implemented with the maximum of certainty for authorities, given the need for this legislation.

I should like to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) for his excellent speech of support and for what he said in justification of the Bill. Throughout the afternoon Opposition Members have looked for sinister motives behind every clause of the Bill. I fear that their search will go unrewarded. They would be better occupied assisting the Bill's passage so that local authorities can be sure of receiving the grant to which they are entitled from the start of the new financial year. I should tell the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) that that is not a threat. It is a statement of fact and, in the light of it, I hope that he will support the Government's efforts.

The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) made much of what he called the delay occasioned by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I reject that entirely. If the hon. Gentleman is sincere about his concern at the effect that delay will have on local authorities and their grant next year, we expect him to support our getting the Bill on to the statute book as soon as possible.

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. It is not a question of argument about delay — the delay is a matter of fact. The Secretary of announced today, at long last, that he knew about this four months ago. There is no argument about that—it is a fact. As for letting the Bill go through, if the Minister will remove the retrospective clauses and set in abeyance the punitive restrictions on the Rates Act 1984, we will let it go through.

Mr. Ancram: I shall come to what the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) said in their speeches. If the hon. Gentleman is sincere about his concern at the effect on RSG, he will support the Bill.

Some of my right hon. and hon. Friends have argued that, rather than bolster the present system, in which faults are widely acknowledged, we should have turned immediately to the Green Paper reform proposals. I have considerable sympathy for that view—it was advanced strongly by my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts)—but it is impossible to set up that new system and the necessary transitional measures in the time available. Today's debate has shown, once again, the urgent need for such reform. Reform is already being undertaken in Scotland.

I listened to what my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon) said about reform. I agree with him about the appalling complexities of the present system, but I am sure that it will be no surprise to him to learn that I did not agree with him about our proposals for Scotland, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has made clear he will bring forward for England. I rather think that my hon. Friend and I may argue about this for some time. We might not reach an agreement immediately, but I am always hopeful that I will in the end convert him.

Mr. Leighton: As the Minister is making the case for great haste and saying that that precludes local authorities from having time to come in for redetermination, does he agree that, in Committee, proper consideration should be given to the cases, such as the borough of Newham, which are harshly treated by the Bill?

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State heard what the hon. Gentleman said. I am sure that this is a matter that will be discussed during the Bill's further proceedings.

My hon. Friend the Member for Slough, supported by my hon. Friends the Members for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), for Halifax (Mr. Galley) and for Basildon (Mr. Amess), said that the grant proposals which are implicit in the Green Paper on rate reform would create a simpler system than that which has caused so many problems. I endorse that view. Those proposals are now part of the legislation for Scotland that we are taking through Committee. They are part of a package which depends also on creating greater accountability through the imposition of the community charge. It would not be possible to introduce that element of the package alone now.

The hon. Member for Blackburn asked why I am responding to the debate. I suggest that, under this Government at least, we are still one United Kingdom, of which Scotland is a part. I remind him, not that it would have been evident if he had looked behind him during the debate, that one fifth of the parliamentary representation of his party comes from Scotland. It is quite right, therefore, that Scotland's view should be represented. When my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for the Environment, made his statement on 16 December a point of order was raised as to why there was no statement on the Scottish position. The reason was, as my right hon. Friend said today in his opening speech, that in Scotland the problem is much more limited than in England and Wales. At the same time, I believe that it would be wholly wrong if the Scottish dimension was ignored tonight.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): Will the hon. Gentleman say a word or two about the Scottish dimension? I see that the Secretary of State is taking powers to indemnify himself, and to ensure that his actions in connection with section 5 of the 1966 Act should not be called in question. It is not clear to me why he needs that indemnity. Indemnity suggests that something wrong has been done, or at least, that something is likely to be successfully challenged in the courts. Perhaps the Minister will just say what the secret sin is, and what the effect would have been if the law had been properly carried out by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Ancram: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on getting Labour's Scottish voice on to the record, even this late in the debate. I shall deal with his points, because I think that the provisions regarding Scotland are important, and I want to explain them fully.

The most important point is that the determination of rate support grant in Scotland does not depend in any way on assessments of relevant or total expenditure, but rather on what local authorities ought to need to spend as determined by a process of assessment known as the client group method, which is intended to provide objective assessments of need, taking into account the different circumstances of each authority. It quite specifically does not take account of their actual expenditure, however defined, and because the determination of the Scottish rate support grant does not depend on any assessment of actual expenditure, it follows that the Secretary of State's actions in determining it are not vulnerable on the basis that he might have misinterpreted what can or cannot legitimately be included as expenditure.

However, on examining our Scottish practices in the light of the problems which have emerged in England and Wales, we discovered that we have counted as expenditure transfers between the general rate fund and special funds in assessing authorities' expenditure for the purpose of imposing grant penalties. According to the system we operate, we would also have been prepared to count such transfers as expenditure had they occurred in the accounts of authorities for whom we were proposing a rate reduction.

An examination of the particular cases where rate reductions have been imposed reveals that there were no such transfers of funds at issue. Clauses 14 and 15 are designed to validate past decisions in relation to grant penalties and to allow us to continue to operate as before, both in the case of grant penalties and in the case of rate reductions.

Mr. Dewar: I recognise that the Minister wants these Scottish points properly ventilated. I promise him that I will read with great care the important statement that he has just read.

Will he confirm my impression that he is saying that the Government are seeking indemnity against a set of circumstances which he is satisfied never occurred? If that is so, why on earth do we need clauses 14 and 15?

Mr. Ancram: I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman has never been a great expert on local government finance. He may therefore find my explanation difficult to understand. What I was saying, and perhaps I can put it in simpler terms for the hon. Gentleman, is that on selective action, there has been no occasion, according to our records, where any authority would have suffered because of the interpretation that has been made. However, the situation is different in relation to grant penalties.

It is an important point that there is no Scottish authority in relation to which we have imposed a rate of reduction which has had a greater reduction imposed on it than it would have had if consideration of special funds had been excluded from our calculations. More to the point in relation to grant penalties, if consideration of special funds had been excluded from our calculations, according to our records there are two instances from 1983-84 where authorities would have been better off; that is, their grant reduction would have been less than it actually is. In the case of one of those authorities that applies to the present financial year, so it is still possible for it to avoid paying grant penalties completely.

Again — this is important to put the matter into context — according to our records, in 32 instances exclusion of consideration of special funds made no difference at all to the grant penalties, and in 29 cases the authorities concerned would have been worse off, in many cases substantially so. That demonstrates clearly the point that the method that we have adopted in calculating expenditure for grant penalty purposes and which we propose, as a result of the Bill, to continue, is clearly seen to be in the interests of local authorities. That is presumably why the local authority associations wish this type of interpretation and calculation to be made.

It also underlines the completely synthetic nature of the Opposition's hostility to these measures today. In the light of the favourable impact that that has had on local authorities in Scotland, I shall be interested to see whether the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) votes against the validation of that tonight. The hon. Members for Copeland and for Blackburn took exception to clause 5 because they argued that it would allow the Secretary of State to make retrospective adjustments to previous years' settlements. They have completely missed the point. Our clear intention is to maintain the status quo and the clause allows us to do that on a proper statutory basis where decisions are to be taken on supplementary reports for the years 1983-84 to 1986-87.

My right hon. Friend has no intention of departing from past practice in that respect. My hon. Friends the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) and for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) were also worried about that point and I hope that they are reassured by what I have said.

Under existing powers in the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, it is open to the Secretary of State to make new directions about total expenditure before each new supplementary report is made—subject, of course, to the overriding legal requirement to act reasonably. That is the same position as that which will apply to the powers to make specifications about total expenditure when new supplementary reports are made for 1983-84 to 1986-87 after Royal Assent has been given to the Bill. Therefore, there is no type of retrospection which is new to the Bill which is not available already under existing powers. The type and concept are the same. I hope that that firmly answers the points that were made by the hon. Members for Copeland and for Blackburn.

I do not want to repeat the detailed summary of the Bill given by my right hon. Friend at the start of the debate. However, I should underline that there is no intention here to create new structures or impose new burdens on local authorities. The Bill builds on an existing mechanism, which is usually called the rate fund revenue account, and translates into statute what is effectively current practice in defining expenditure. So far as possible, it adopts the wording of the provisions of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. Hon. Members will, of course, have the opportunity to consider the details in Committee.

The hon. Member for Copeland mentioned the promises about the operation of what is now the Rates Act during and after its passage. He was somewhat wide of the mark on this occasion. We accept that we are not following the Rates Act procedures. My right hon. Friend has explained why we have to adopt, for 1987-88 only, the approach to rate and precept limitation contained in the Bill. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Copeland will listen rather than muttering from a sedentary position, he may, yet again, hear the explanation. It would simply not have been possible to carry through the normal Rates Act procedures, given the need for legislation on the definition of expenditure.

Labour Members have sought to argue that the method adopted and the formulae proposed in the Bill are wildly unreasonable. In reaching decisions on the formulae, the Secretaries of State took account, as in any normal year, of all the information available to them about the designated authorities. They took particular note of applications for the redetermination of expenditure levels. The representations made at meetings about those applications were carefully considered. Of course, given the need for the formula approach, limits cannot be precisely tailored to individual circumstances as in a normal year, but, so far as is possible, they reflect decisions that would have been taken under Rates Act procedures, and those decisions are now subject to the scrutiny of Parliament.

Before leaving rate limitation, I should remind the House what it is all about. Some Opposition Members seem to have forgotten its purpose. My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) reminded us that the aim of the policy is to protect ratepayers by holding down rates and expenditure.

Some authorities, despite being rate-limited in 1985-86 and 1986-87, have attempted to maintain their high levels of spending and have taken no steps to cut out waste and inefficiency or other unnecessary burdens on their ratepayers. It is right that the disciplines of rate limitation should be firmly maintained.

Mr. Straw: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: No. I have already given way on a number of occasions.

Where authorities are newly selected for rate capping in 1987-88, my right hon. Friend has proposed some additional flexibility above the original expenditure levels set in July, but the fact remains that those authorities were selected because they were among the highest spenders, and the purpose of rate limitation is to restrain that spending and to protect ratepayers.

The hon. Members for Copeland and for Blackburn asked whether paragraph 3(2) of schedule 2 would enable my right hon. Friend to determine revised expenditure levels for rate-capped authorities before the passing of the Bill. The answer is no. As my right hon. Friend made clear to the House in his statement on 16 December, once he had received the advice on total expenditure, he could not make any further rate support grant reports or complete the rate limitation process until matters were put right and there was new legislation. Thus, at the moment he cannot redetermine expenditure levels, and once the Bill receives Royal Assent there will be, only for 1987-88, a new method for completing the rate limitation process according to the formulae in the Bill.

A number of Opposition Members mentioned the effect of the Bill on court decisions. The hon. Member for Copeland made great play of clauses 4(6) and 6(4). Those provisions validate past decisions on rate support grant and rate limitation respectively. We accept that, until the Bill receives Royal Assent, the validity of past decisions is in doubt. Nothing but further uncertainty would be gained by local authorities challenging those decisions. The Bill clearly and unambiguously provides that challenges against past decisions will be of no effect.

The Bill is not concerned, as the hon. Member for Copeland appeared to be suggesting, with validating future decisions taken in accordance with the provisions of the Bill and the related legislation. Local authorities will, of course, be free to challenge those.

A number of hon. Members mentioned deficit financing. The Bill provides that the Secretary of State may make specifications to discount for grant purposes contributions to special funds against no known liability which create a deficit on the rate fund revenue account and the subsequent drawing down of such contributions. The Bill will put the position beyond doubt. Had the need for the Bill not arisen, the Secretary of State would have taken the action under existing powers. It has been suggested that some sort of conspiracy is involved but, again, Opposition Members are well wide of the mark.

The Bill is not controversial, except in the conspiratorial minds of Opposition Members. It is necessary in the interests of councils which have previously endorsed the principle that it now firmly establishes. It is also in the interests of ratepayers and of good government, both local and national. I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to support it.

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

LOCAL GOVERNMENT FINANCE BILL [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified — Resolved.

That, for the purpose of any Act resulting from the Local Government Finance Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliamemt of any increase attributable to that Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other Act — [Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Residential Care Homes

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

10.26 pm

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I am especially pleased tonight to initiate this short Adjournment debate on residential care homes for the elderly, which is a matter of great concern to hon. Members on both sides of the House and which has become a growth industry over the years.

I first became especially worried about residential homes in December 1985. Although the new Registered Homes Act 1984 provided for every home to be inspected not less than twice in every 12-month period, it did not prescribe a minimum number of beds. Similarly, although it required the person registered to provide adequate professional, technical, ancillary and other staff and to make adequate arrangements for patients in the home to receive medical and dental services where necessary, it did not really define what was adequate or professional.

On looking through the papers and assessing the numbers of such homes, I was horrified by the tremendous growth in residential care homes. Although I am not in any way criticising private enterprise, it seems especially easy for anyone to set up a residential care home. I welcome the presence of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security on the Front Bench tonight, and I particularly wish to draw her attention to the private sector homes in England. I am satisfied that local authority homes appear to be properly policed, but it seems that private sector homes are not always properly assessed. In 1984 there were 4,090 such homes with 50,168 residents. In 1985 the number of homes had risen to 5,200 and the residents to 69,000. By 1986, on the provisional figures that my right hon. Friend the Minister gave me on 27 November, there were 6,303 homes and something like 80,000 residents.

Residential care homes are a very successful industry. It is a growth industry and one in which I would expect the quality of care provided in the homes to be of the utmost in usefulness, kindness, love and great care. My hon. Friend the Minister's predecessor made it quite clear that there would be an examination of the standards being set locally by the authorities concerned and of the extent to which the legislation is being implemented, in ways that seek to develop constructive partnerships between the statutory, voluntary and private sectors of residential care.

However, one must obviously look at the provisions of the 1984 Act and at the role placed on the local social service authorities and the district health authorities respectively. I want to see the improved arrangements for registering and inspecting all residential care homes brought forward. I know that they came into force on 1 January 1985, but I am not convinced that they are as thorough in their investigations and examinations as the Act originally intended. There is a difficulty, because we are reducing Government interference in many areas. "Building Businesses not Barriers" makes specific reference to the registration of such homes and their inspection.

In no way do I wish any registered home to have fewer than two inspections per year. It is welcome that the overall fees for such homes have risen—the annual fee has been increased to £15 a place, the annual registration fee to £100 and the initial registration fee to £550. Therefore, proprietors of homes should expect at least quarterly inspections by representatives of the DHSS or local authorities. I believe that local authorities should carry out the first inspection, and that thereafter the DHSS should keep a watching brief.

I know of many instances where local authorities have telephoned homes and said, "We are coming next week, stand by for inspection." Although I do not wish the element of surprise to be Gestapo-like, the inspections should be carried out regularly and without too much advance notice. I want homes to demonstrate love and care and attention at all times. The requirements are quite clear. I want residential homes to be bright, bustling and happy. Safety should be a priority, with no loose rugs, unexpected steps to gardens or bathrooms, awkward stairs or old wiring.

Age Concern has studied the problems in such homes. There should be a proper fee structure for residents, who can so easily be taken advantage of. Some elderly people, as their age advances, become somewhat of a burden in the family home and it becomes necessary for them to be put in residential care. I am happy to state that no residential homes in Leicester take advantage of the elderly, but dangerous precedents could be established. Homes should show kindness and provide proper professional help.

I know of homes that maintain that full medical staff are available 24 hours a day. Certainly, registered nursing homes would be required to meet that criterion. However, the Registered Homes Act 1984 also implies that properly qualified medical staff should be in attendance at all times. It is no good just having a doctor on the board and his name appearing on the headed paper — medical staff should be available at the home. The proprietors of registered homes—who should live on the premises—should make the position quite clear. I know of cases of staff being dressed up to look like nurses, which gives a false impression to the inspectors and prospective residents alike.

I understand that poaching has occurred — where residents are visited by nice old ladies saying, "Come on, let's go and have a nice strawberry tea". They take them to another residential care home, and the next thing is that that elderly person has been "poached" and easy money is made.

Because there is no stipulation as to the minimum number of beds required in a residential care home, sometimes beds are moved out of rooms when the proprietors know that the inspectors are due to visit, to make what is really a double room look like a single room. That is absolute deceit and easy pickings. I know of a case in the Birmingham area where an elderly gentleman is being charged £16,000 a year by a residential care home. I find it incredible that he is kicked out of bed at 6.30 am and forced back to bed at 6 pm, does not have good food and is lucky if he meets other people during the day. Something must be done to guide prospective residential care home proprietors as to the requirement and comforts that should be available to all prospective residents.

I asked my hon. Friend's predecessor to introduce a band of price ranges for facilities. I know that it is unusual for a Right-wing Tory Member to call for Government interference, but I believe that a minimum and maximum charge should be stipulated for providing permanent residential accommodation. That residential charge should be in a band from £125 that the DHSS allows to perhaps £160. I ask my hon. Friend to look at this, because £240, which is a regular charge, is incredible for the services provided, some of which are questionable.

It is clear that too many of these homes are registered too soon. On my way in the mornings, I pass two large terraced houses. Over three months, they have become a residential care home, but that is too quick. While it is worthwhile to register and establish homes, this must not be done too quickly. At the moment the number of old people is increasing rapidly. I do not want them to be taken advantage of, and I want to see such precautions as proper fire escapes. Health and safety officers have a right of entry, but perhaps do not go to such places often enough, particularly as so many are now being established. The officers should be allowed in to get on with checking.

Many of these old people are disabled and should not be put in upstairs rooms. They can be taken up and down by lift, but they might be trapped up there. They must be treated with humanity and kindness at all times. Many residential care home proprietors show much more love, kindness and decency than some relations. That is a sad fact of life.

On the coldest day of the year, with Big Ben stopping at four o'clock for a few minutes, we should remember that elderly people need as much warmth as possible—not just blankets but proper facilities. I look forward to inspections and investigations taking place in the winter. At the moment, many of these places seem to be inspected only in the spring. Let us ensure that conditions are examined at the worst time of the year. I am not arguing for cold payments, I reassure my hon. Friend the Minister.

Another factor is that many people are living longer. Britain has a reputation for an increasing number of people living over the age of 65. Residential care will be a growth industry and it is important that we provide maximum as well as minimum requirements to ensure that inspections are carried out at all times, although that is already required under section 17 (ii) of the Registered Homes Act. There should be more inspections, and I urge my hon. Friend to look at this and at the charges. It would be a great service to the public if she were to introduce a system of minimum and maximum charges both for residential care homes and nursing homes.

The type of accommodation is varied. In some of the advisory documents it has been made clear that some people would like to share, but they should not be charged £16,000 a year if they do so. Multi-occupancy and connecting rooms should be considered. There is no ratio of single to double occupancy. No two people are the same, as the local authority circular of January 1986 pointed out. We must look on our elderly people with even greater respect.

We should consider how to strengthen the Registered Homes Act 1984 to do something about the lack of safeguards. It will mean a substantial increase in the cost of running the homes but a big increase in health and safety checks, which is important. I would like to see 24-hour medical cover, and qualified nurses, who know how to cope with emergencies, on the premises. I do not want people dressing up as auxiliaries when they are not.

I should like a scale of maximum and minimum charges to be published. That would ensure that no elderly people or their relations are caught out by having to pay for hidden extras to get the basic service. Private enterprise should continue to thrive, but old people's homes should be exempted so that there is the best possible control over them. I am not in favour of NUPE's idea of midnight visits, but the inspection system must be updated as a matter of urgency. It is no use telephoning a residential care home and saying, "I should like to visit you; what time can I come?" There should not be too many unannounced visits, but proper visits must be made.

I welcome the increase in fees. Proprietors of residential care homes will realise that, once they are registered, there are effective safeguards. If registration and licensing are made a little harder, they will be worth far more.

In the east midlands there is a very good organisation that looks after residential care homes. I congratulate it and Mrs. Heather Cowley. Nevertheless, we must ensure that all these homes are up to the same standard and that it is not made easy for buildings to be converted overnight into brand new residential care homes. This is a growth industry. We must do everything in our power to protect the elderly. They are living longer. I look forward to many other hon. Members on both sides of the House saying that they are in favour of additional help and support being provided for the elderly.

Only 650 people have gone into residential care homes in Leicestershire. Proprietors of residential care homes have written to me. The proprietor of a home in Eastbourne says:

"People are openly advertising and taking three elderly people with no supervision and possibly not even paying tax. This is a situation that needs to be looked into. May I add that whatever the room size, the facilities offered, it is the owners and their attitudes to the care, dignity and quality of life of those people in their area that really matters."

Letters of support have come from the Isle of Wight community health council. It has asked for updates on the way to curb the increase in private residential care homes which has been unleashed. There is also a letter from the South Warwickshire community health council. It is extremely worried about the growth in the number of residential care homes.

I welcome the fact that the private enterprise sector has resulted in many more new proprietors of residential care homes, but I urge my hon. Friend and her Department to look carefully at the way in which the elderly are cared for. The Department of Health and Social Security will pay most of the price, but it should not be a blank cheque. It might price itself out of the market. The elderly must be given the best possible help, love and attention, and the safeguards that I have outlined will ensure that when an elderly person enters a residential care home he is given love, care and attention by properly trained staff. There must be regular inspections and the fees charged must be such as to provide for elderly people the kind of service that will enable them to live in dignity for the rest of their lives.

10.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on his success in Mr. Speaker's ballot and for choosing such an important subject. He has already shown great interest in this topic. I read his November article in Social Work Today with great interest. I assure him and all concerned of the importance that the Government place on voluntary and private residential care homes and on their having proper standards, and I am sure he agrees that they have a vital role to play in the provision of community care.

I was a little sad that my hon. Friend used the word "horrified" when he referred to this growth. That growth and development have been meeting a considerable need and it is good to see the private sector doing it so well.

Let me deal with a number of the points that my hon. Friend raised. He mentioned control on charges by homes. There is no control on those charges any more than there is for any other services and we would not wish to see any. The amounts paid are a matter between those running the homes and the residents or the relatives of the residents who are meeting those charges. The charges could be expected to reflect the services and the facilities available as determined by market forces, in which my hon. Friend and I have considerable faith.

In our view, it would not be proper to introduce a system of minimum and maximum charges for the provision of services paid for privately. I know that my hon. Friend is a keen supporter of a free market and, as he is aware, many of the residents of these homes are well able to pay the prices set, especially if they have disposed of a property before entering a home. The same applies to what my hon. Friend called poaching. That is a private, commercial matter between homes and it is not for the Department of Health and Social Security to intervene.

In one case of misrepresentation in a home for mentally handicapped people in Manchester, the registration of that home was cancelled and an appeal by the owner of the home against that cancellation was not upheld. We are aware that where there may be serious misrepresentations we have the right and the power to act. The payment of supplementary benefit is another matter and I shall now deal with that.

My hon. Friend mentioned growth in the number of homes as a whole and growth in the number of residents. I am sure he will not mind if I refer to the number of supplementary benefit board and lodging claimants in independent homes in Great Britain, because it gives an idea of the increasing responsibility of the Department. In 1978 the number of residents claiming board and lodging allowance was 7,000. The amount being spent was £6 million and the average payment was £15·70 per resident. By 1984, the number of claimants was 42,000. Spending had risen to £200 million from £6 million, and the average payment was £91·50 per resident. These figures relate to Scotland as well as to England and Wales. We do not yet have information for 1985, although the Audit Commission recently estimated that some £500 million was now in payment. We are not in entire agreement with the Audit Commission about how it arrived at its figure, but there is no doubt that the amount has increased quite substantially.

The growth in these numbers was not entirely unexpected and to the extent that it meets a need not previously met it is welcome, but it showed us the need for better targeting of the benefit and improved expenditure control. For that reason, a number of studies were set in hand and the amounts to be paid were set at maxima around the country. A working party is currently looking at the arrangements for financial support of residents in all types of residential care homes — local authority, voluntary, and private. That working party is chaired by the Department's official, Mrs. Joan Firth. Our aim is a system of financial support which is responsive to the needs of individuals and which gives better value for public money. The working party will report to Ministers and to local authority associations around Easter this year.

A series of pilot studies have been undertaken by Professor Bradshaw from York university and they have been conducted in four areas—Lothian, Clwyd, Devon and Sefton—to see if the local authorities could advise us on whether a system of assessment could be introduced to see if supplementary benefit claimants in residential homes are most appropriately cared for in that setting and whether the homes' charges are reasonable in the light of the services provided. We expect that report to come to us by Easter.

As my hon. Friend knows, the limits placed on the supplementary payments to residents were reviewed last year following a study of homes' costs by the management consultants Ernst and Whinney. Their report is in the Library. As my hon. Friend may well know, as a result of that report some maxima were increased. The limits for the elderly were set at £125 per week with a London limit of £142·50 and a new category for the very dependent elderly eligible for higher rates of attendance allowance and for the blind was set at £140 with a London rate of £157·50, and a further category of younger physically disabled has been set at £197·50 for London and £180 for the rest of the country. Therefore, we have set maxima of the payments that we are prepared to meet from supplementary benefit. The Ernst and Whinney study produced a usable response from only about 23 per cent. of the homes that were contacted, but the study showed that at least some homes were using the supplementary benefit figures as maxima, whereas many others were not. However, the other studies should tell us more about that.

I share my hon. Friend's interest in and concern about standards. I am sure that we agree that the vast majority of homes offer an excellent standard of care—often far higher than those of the local authorities which we are asking to supervise them. Since 1948, residential care homes have had to be registered with local social services authorities. That registration is not automatic. The registration authorities must be satisfied, among other things, that the person applying for registration is fit to run a particular type of home and that the facilities, staffing and care provided are up to the standard required. The authorities can insist on alterations before granting the registration, and it is the local authority's responsibility, under all the legislation going back for a long time, to ensure that reasonable standards are maintained. It is required to carry out at least one inspection a year. It need not give notice or make an appointment. It can visit at night and in the winter. Indeed, some home proprietors have been complaining about late-night visits, although I agree with my hon. Friend that they may need to be done in that way.

The homes are also subject to environmental health officers' standards and fire service requirements, and the home proprietors have had occasion to complain about that, too. They are also subject to the Inland Revenue, like any other business, and anyone not declaring income may have a nasty surprise in store.

My hon. Friend asked about realistic registration fees. Under the Registered Homes Act 1984, the initial fee is £550, plus £100 for a manager, where relevant, and a further charge of £15 a place annually. A typical home with 30 or 35 places is certainly paying about £500 a year to the local authority. The penalty for offences has been increased from a maximum of £500 to £2,000. There is a national list of council registrations which is updated quarterly, and there have been 82 residential care home appeals to the Registered Homes Tribunal against local authorities' refusal to register a home or decision to cancel or amend a registration. So far, nine appeals have been upheld, 28 dismissed and 22 withdrawn.

In addition, a non-statutory code of practice, "Home-Life", which is in the Library, has been drawn up by an independent working party and forms the basis for the recommendations that we request the registering authorities to make and to carry out in their inspections of private homes.

My hon. Friend will be aware that some of his suggestions would require primary legislation. Since the law has been in operation for only two years—it came into force almost exactly two years ago—it would be wise to see how it has operated during those two years and how its objectives can be carried forward before we start to amend and reorganise it, especially since we are talking about so many homes and individuals.

Some concern has been expressed about the minimum of four residents for registration. In practice, that has been the minimum for a long time. It was thought that the line had to be drawn somewhere and that it should remain there. The 1985 costing study by the social services inspectorate showed us that local authorities were hard pressed in processing new registrations and inspecting existing homes that had to be registered even before we set them further tasks. If we were to ask them to inspect the tiniest homes, they might be put under such pressure that they would miss problems in homes on which we have asked them to keep an eye.

My hon. Friend asked about staff and standards. Unless the private residential home is dually registered as a nursing home, in which case it must be registered with the health authority and the rules about nursing and other staff are slightly different, it is not required to have staff with medical or nursing qualifications. The care normally provided in a residential care home is broadly equivalent to what might be given by a competent and caring relative able to respond to emotional as well as physical needs. Therefore, a medical and nursing qualfication is not considered necessary. Any professional health care needed by a resident would be provided by his or her general practitioner or the community nursing service, as appropriate, and under its supervision. To ask for 24-hour medical cover for an ordinary residential care home would be going over the top, except in so far as someone who was ill did not receive such cover from his general practitioner.

On top of all of the other studies that I have mentioned, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has asked Sir Roy Griffiths to do a review of community care. Between Griffiths, Firth, Bradshaw and the review of residential care currently being chaired by Lady Wagner, this sector is probably being investigated more than almost anything else.

In the light of all of those studies, some of which are to report to us very shortly and some of which are to report to us later—such as the Wagner report which will come in 1988 — I would prefer to see how the current legislation, which is relatively new, is carried out in practice and ensure that we do not change something before it has had time to settle in.

In those ways, the sector is being studied and encouraged to expand and develop in satisfactory and suitable ways to provide a good standard of care. We will take careful note of all of the recommendations, including those of my hon. Friend, and I am most grateful to him for raising this most important issue.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before we start on Questions, I say to the House that I have a voice difficulty today. There is nothing wrong with my eyesight or my hearing. I hope that I shall not have to use my voice too much. I ask for the assistance of the House.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Hospital Treatment

1. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he takes to investigate complaints from National Health Service patients about the treatment they receive in National Health Service hospitals.

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): The investigation of complaints made by National Health Service patients about National Health Service hospital treatment is a matter for the appropriate health authority.

Mr. Adley: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply. Nevetheless, I bring to his attention the fact that some of my hon. Friends and I have received a number of serious complaints about medical decisions taken and treatment received by patients attending the Royal Victoria hospital at Boscombe, which is outwith but near my constituency. To my knowledge, at least four deaths were involved, including the death of a relative of an hon. Member. Unfortunately, in spite of my right hon. Friend's answer, the regional health authority appeared to obfuscate behind a smokescreen of anonymity. It was unwilling to arrange a meeting with those concerned and me, and now has even failed to reply to my last letter of 27 November. What redress do members of the public have in the face of this situation?

Mr. Fowler: In view of what my hon. Friend said, it would be sensible, perhaps, if he were to meet the Minister for Health on this matter. The hospital in question seeks to give a good service, and many people speak highly of it.

Mr. Nellist: Will the Secretary of State reconsider his earlier answer and extend the requested investigation to the condition of patients before they reach hospital so that it takes account of a number of occurrences in Coventry during the recess? Ambulance services are deteriorating because of the insufficient number of vehicles and crews. One person waited 50 minutes for an ambulance from Solihull because one was not available in Coventry. After suffering a heart attack, that person died before the ambulance could reach him. That was not an isolated incident in the past three or four weeks. What will the Secretary of State do to provide more money for crews and vehicles in Coventry?

Mr. Fowler: I shall certainly examine the individual case that the hon. Gentleman has raised. Obviously, from what he said, it is a serious issue. I am satisfied that the West Midlands ambulance service is working effectively. Only recently I had the opportunity to see just that.

Mr. Bill Walker: When my right hon. Friend considers genuine complaints against the National Health Service, will he also bear in mind the thousands of individuals who receive splendid treatment from the National Health Service, myself included? Will he bear in mind the high standard of professionalism, integrity and dedication of the staff of Ninewells hospital? It is largely through their efforts that I am here today.

Mr. Fowler: I am sure that the whole House is pleased to see my hon. Friend restored and returned to this place. He is right. All the opinion polls of those who have experience of the Health Service show that people are overwhelmingly satisfied with the service that they receive.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Given that there is generally a high level of satisfaction with the treatment that people receive when they arrive for the appropriate care, will the Secretary of State comment on the problem that arises when people have to wait for treatment by specialists involved with both the private and the National Health Service sectors? Prospective patients are told that if they pay they can be seen more quickly. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that that causes great distress to many people?

Mr. Fowler: Yes, but that is not remotely the general position. Of course, we can have a debate about the situation in both the private and public sectors. As I understand it, the hon. Gentleman's party supports the concept of a private sector. I do not find that the types of complaint he is making are remotely typical of the Health Service.

Mr. Speller: I should like to take my right hon. Friend back to the first question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) and stress that my hon. Friend is not alone in pointing out the problems of that hospital in Boscombe. Mr. Thomas, the father of one of my constituents, died there in September last year. No satisfaction or information has been obtainable through community health councils or the hospital. Is my right hon. Friend replying to my letter of 6 December to his office? May I associate myself with any meeting held with the Minister for Health as suggested by my right hon. Friend?

Mr. Fowler: I believe that a reply will be sent to my hon. Friend in the next 24 hours. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister for Health will be delighted to see my hon. Friend in the deputation.

Sick Pay

2. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services from which organisations representations were received asking him to simplify the payment of statutory sick pay.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Nicholas Lyell): Representations have been received from both sides of industry for changes and simplification of the statutory sick pay scheme. They include among employers' organisations the CBI, the Engineering Employers Federation, the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses, the Pay-roll Alliance and the Association of Independent Businesses, and for employees' and consumer organisations, the TUC, the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux and the Disability Alliance.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is the real reason for cutting out the middle rate of statutory sick pay not simplification, as the Minister said, but savings of £19 million, which yet again have been made at the expense of the sick?

Mr. Lyell: No. Eighty-five per cent. will receive the standard, which is the higher rate. It does not make sense to have two rates. It is true that there are savings of £19 million—against a background of nearly £750 million—but they will not all be at the expense of the sick because, as the hon. Lady knows, a very high proportion belong to occupational schemes.

Mrs. Beckett: Surely my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) is correct. What the Minister has said today is wholly contrary to what was said by his Department less than a year ago when it claimed that the system was extremely simple and was working very well. Is not the only explanation the combination of the savings and the Government's desire to placate employers by this change while at the same time introducing statutory maternity pay, which neither employers nor mothers want?

Mr. Lyell: That is not correct. The system is working well now. There have been strong requests for simplification, not just by employers. The increase in the lower rate will benefit those who receive statutory maternity pay.

North West Thames Regional Health Authority

3. Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he last met the chairman of the North West Thames regional health authority; whether future capital expenditure projects for Bedfordshire were discussed; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Tony Newton): My right hon. Friend was able to discuss capital projects for south Bedfordshire with the chairman of the North West Thames regional health authority at the November meeting of regional chairmen. The regional health authority has provisionally identified expenditure of about £20 million in its capital programme for expenditure in south Bedfordshire.

Mr. Madel: As there has been a history of underfunding in south Bedfordshire resulting in towns like Leighton Buzzard still not having a hospital, will my hon. Friend join me in urging the North West Thames regional health authority to change its policy and increase capital expenditure to take account of recent and planned increases in population in the south of the county?

Mr. Newton: As I have told my hon. Friend, the regional health authority has acknowledged the desirability in the longer term of a community hospital at Leighton Buzzard. The authority also feels that additional development at the Luton and Dunstable hospital would be a proper precursor to that. I would hesitate to try to second guess that authority's judgment of the overall local situation.

Mr. Dobson: Will the funds that the Minister is talking about ensure that there is no recurrence of the five occasions in the past two years when hospitals in Bedfordshire have had to cease taking waiting list patients in order to cope with emergency admissions?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman asks a typically irresponsible question. He knows perfectly well that the long-standing and important emergency bed service arrangements necessarily deal with the possibility that non-emergency cases may need to be deferred when emergency cases arise. That is entirely sensible.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: While obviously not wishing to denigrate in any way any of the hospital developments in Bedfordshire, will my hon. Friend confirm that my constituents in Hemel Hempstead will not be expected to travel to Dunstable or for that matter to Northwick Park in order to get ENT services if capital developments take place in Dunstable?

Mr. Newton: If my hon. Friend is speaking about the possibility of a new hospital for east Hertfordshire, he will know that such a proposal is being considered by the Department.

Wrightlington Hospital

4. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to announce his decision on the proposed closure of the Wrightlington hospital children's ward.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Services (Mrs. Edwina Currie): Shortly, Sir.

Mr. Atkins: Does my hon. Friend recognise that this matter has been going on for a long time and that it will be looked upon as very much a test of the Government's commitment to those in particular need in and around north central Lancashire? The sooner my hon. Friend can make a decision to relieve people of their doubts and worries about the future of the hospital and the services it provides, the better.

Mrs. Currie: I recognise that, but I would rather take a little longer and get the decision right.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister recognise that this matter worries all political parties and, equally, it worries the people of north-east Lancashire, who are anxious to see that there is no detriment to the service provided in this region?

Mrs. Currie: I recognise that and I thank the hon. Gentleman for his remarks. Any decision taken will be taken entirely in the interests of the patients and particularly of the children concerned.

Heart Diseases

5. Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about charges for medication for those suffering from heart diseases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Since 1 January 1986 we have received 12 letters from hon. Members and three letters from members of the public about prescription charges for those suffering from heart disease.

Mr. Nicholls: Does my hon. Friend think it is fair that if a doctor chooses to treat a cardiac patient by surgery that operation and the back-up services are completely free, while if he decided to treat it medically the prescription charges have to be paid? Surely if it is possible to argue in favour of free needles for drug abusers, it should be possible in these circumstances to give free prescriptions to cardiac patients.

Mr. Newton: I hesitate to accept the proposition that any patient suffering from a condition that might give rise to a need for an operation should automatically receive free prescriptions in advance. I also hesitate to accept the parallel that my hon. Friend seeks to draw with some experimental projects designed to find out whether we can by that means help to curb the spread of the awful disease of AIDS.

Dr. M. S. Miller: In view of all the difficulties which arise, the various groups, and the number of people who do not pay prescription charges, would it not be better to consider the possibility of eliminating such charges altogether?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman must acknowledge that prescription charges and the charges for the season tickets raise well over £100 million a year, which is an important contribution to the NHS budget, so I do not think that I wish to go down that track.

St. James Hospital

6. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what discussions he has had with the Wandsworth health authority as to the possible closure of St. James hospital, Balham, SW12.

Mrs. Edwina Currie: None, Sir. The matter is still under consideration locally and has not yet come to Ministers.

Mr. Cox: Is the Minister aware of the utter confusion now existing in Wandsworth because of the incompetence of the Wandsworth health authority in following the correct procedures on consultation and discussion in the community? Is she further aware of the complete opposition in the borough of Wandsworth, even of the Tory-controlled local authority, to the closure of St. James hospital? If public opinion is to mean anything, is it not time that the Wandsworth health authority took note of what the people of Wandsworth are saying and of their desire to keep this hospital open?

Mrs. Currie: As regards procedures, the porposal to close St. James was agreed at the district health authority meeting on 27 November. It has not yet reached the South West Thames regional health authority, which will consider it on 28 January. If the region, the district and the CHC disagree, it will come to Ministers for consideration. That is the appropriate procedure.

As regards what the Wandsworth health authority is getting up to and local approval or disapproval of it, will the local people also disapprove of the £17 million to be spent on St. George's hospital, including £800,000 for the accident and emergency departments?

Mr. Dubs: Does the Minister agree that there is enormous pressure on hospital places, both in the Wandsworth area and in south London in general, and that this, combined with the inability of the Department of Health and Social Services to predict the extra places that will be needed as a result of a likely increase in the number of AIDS patients, makes it irresponsible to consider the closure of a major hospital at this stage?

Mrs. Currie: The difficulty, as I understand it, is that St. James will need a very substantial sum of money spent on it very soon — about £12 million. The question is whether London patients are better served by spending money on an old hospital that might not suit their needs much longer or spending it on developing new and expanded services elsewhere in the same district.

Severe Weather Payments

7. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will reconsider the trigger temperature of −1·5°C for severe weather payments.

The Minister for Social Security and the Disabled (Mr. Major): It is our firm expectation that the trigger point for severe weather payments will be reached throughout the country this week. In view of this and of the unprecedented cold weather, I wish to make it clear today that the extra payment of £5 will be made to everyone in the qualifying groups for this week. These groups are householders on supplementary benefit with someone in their family who is 65 or over, chronically sick or disabled or under two. The Government are determined that vulnerable groups should know without delay where they stand, so that they will not be discouraged from heating their homes during this very cold spell. In the unlikely event that not all the areas reach the trigger point, action will be taken to validate the payments made.

Mr. Madden: Will the Minister accept — [HON. MEMBERS: "Thank him."]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Madden: Will the Minister accept that there are pensioners who are literally scared to death that they will be unable to pay the bills for the fuel required to heat their homes properly? Does he not also recognise — I believe that he has in his answer — that what is required is for all pensioners to be confident that they will have sufficient money throughout the winter months to pay their bills and heat their homes properly? That is what lies behind our suggestion that all pensioners on supplementary benefit should receive £5 a week from mid-December to March to enable them to pay their bills in the winter months.

Will the Minister observe some modesty in his claims about his Government's efforts on behalf of pensioners, bearing in mind that single pensioners, because of the break of the link between pensions, earnings and prices, have to date lost £8 a week and married pensioners £12·75?

Mr. Major: We are absolutely determined that vulnerable groups should keep warm, which is why I have made the statement that I have just made. That is why we have increased each of the three tiers of special help for heating: supplementary benefits; the heating additions, which we have extended and widened and made statutory; and, for the first time, the introduction of a statutory entitlement to a cold weather payment. Each of the three tiers of help has been increased by the Government because we are absolutely determined that the vulnerable groups shall have the confidence to keep warm in this weather. That is also why, in these special circumstances of unprecedented cold weather, I have made the announcement today, before the trigger point has been reached, so that people may have the confidence to keep warm.

Mr. Hirst: Is my hon. Friend aware that his announcement will be warmly welcomed by many of my constituents, not least those who live in outlying rural areas who frequently experience much lower temperatures than the trigger or monitoring point for Strathclyde region? While I very much welcome what he has done, can he give any hope that we can, without cumbersome buraucracy, find ways of accommodating people in outlying rural areas, who frequently experience lower temperatures?

Mr. Major: I think I demonstrated a flexibility in the last few moments that my hon. Friend might not have anticipated. We share the concern. That is why I made the statement. Since my hon. Friend's constituents will be paticularly concerned about this, I should add that it will be widely advertised over the next few days, not least, I trust, by the media, who have shown some interest in the matter.

Mr. Winnick: Is the Minister aware that although what he has announced is some small relief, there are still many pensioners who are not eligible to claim it? Moreover, does not the scheme as it operates at the moment help only those with less than £500 capital and those on certain categories of supplementary benefit? Does the Minister not recognise that there are many elderly people on small incomes, not claiming supplementary benefit, but perhaps just a bit above the limit, who will not get any help? Is it not also disgraceful that from next year all heating additions are to be abolished, including even this scheme which has been triggered?

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman is being typically mealy-mouthed. I invite him to recollect that heating additions, which amount to over £400 million a year, have been widened and extended and made a statutory entitlement under this Government, and that during the period of Labour Governments there was no statutory entitlement to exceptionally severe cold weather payments. The winters in those days were equally cold and the hon. Gentleman's conscience is a very late arrival.

Mr. Michael Marshall: Does my hon. Friend accept that his news today will be welcomed, but that some of us are still concerned that the formula which is part of the system at present may cause him difficulty? Will he keep an open mind in considering the system itself in future?

Mr. Major: My mind on flexibility concerning regulations is ever open.

Mr. Wallace: of course, the Minister is right when he says that vulnerable groups should know where they stand. Is it not the case that during the last 72 hours of bitterly cold weather, until he made his announcement a few moments ago these vulnerable groups did not know where they stood? Could this not go on for several weeks throughout the winter? Are we to have the Minister coming to the Dispatch Box perhaps once a week to indicate whether in that week people will get the £5 addition? Is that not a mean amount, considering the cold that people have suffered, particularly in the remote areas where transport costs mean that the additional expenditure of this week will be far more than £5 will cover?

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman clearly does not understand the basic method of assisting vulnerable groups with heating costs. The essential assistance comes, first, in the supplementary benefit rates and, secondly, in the specific heating additions which we have extended, widened and made a regular weekly entitlement for 52 weeks of the year for vulnerable groups. That is what is expected to meet their heating bills. When the weather is unexpectedly severe, this Government, for the first time, have made available special extra help to underpin and help pay the bills that will subsequently come in. The hon. Gentleman should welcome that.

Mr. Cockeram: Is it not the case that the Conservative party first introduced this payment and that therefore by their bleatings the Labour party is shedding mere crocodile tears, otherwise it would have taken steps when it had the power to do so?

Mr. Major: I think that the main concern of my hon. Friend and of everyone on the Conservative Benches is to ensure that the elderly and the vulnerable are protected by having adequate heating. My hon. Friend has made a perfectly fair and valid political point. We have acted to help with heating costs. When the Labour party was in power, it did not do so.

Mr. James Lamond: Now that the Minister has been forced by the sheer logic of events to jettison one of the main regulations with regard to the heating allowance, is it not sensible that he should look at the other petty regulations that were outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) in relation to the amount of capital a recipient can have in the bank, money probably set aside for the recipient's funeral?

Can the Minister not find a better location for the taking of temperatures than those that have been allocated? For example, in my constituency people have been suffering as a result of snowfalls for a considerable time, while the temperature at Manchester airport is the figure that is taken to trigger the extra allowance.

Mr. Major: I have not jettisoned the regulations. I have told the House that I expect that the regulations will be triggered and, to avoid uncertainty about vulnerable groups, I have made the statement at a very early stage. In relation to the hon. Gentleman's point about the £500 qualifying capital limit, that is not novel to this benefit. I remind him that during the period of the Labour Government the figure was £200, and that only at the very end of their term in office was it £300.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The measure announced by my hon. Friend is to be welcomed. In addition, will he give attention to home improvement, and in particular home insulation? On the face of it, he is subsiding heat loss through uninsulated roofs and pipes. In a quieter moment, will he get together with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy and work out a scheme to replace the revenue lost with longer-term capital improvements?

Mr. Major: Such discussions are already in hand. My hon. Friend gives me an adequate and welcome opportunity to mention and praise the work of the neighbourhood energy action groups, which have provided 360 local home insulation projects, 6,000 voluntary workers and a substantial amount of insulation for the homes of people who are especially needy. People who may perhaps need information about that may call the free telephone number 0800 234 8000.

Mr. Meacher: Does not the Minister's statement show that the trigger of minus 1·5 deg C was wrongly set at an absurdly low figure? Why is he not withdrawing the scheme altogether? Is he aware that payment of £5 for one week only in no way comes near to meeting need after the worst January weather on record? Is he further aware that if pensions had been increased in line with earnings, as they were under the previous Labour Government, the single pension today would be £8 a week higher and the married pension £12 a week higher, and there would be no need for bureaucratic and cumbersome schemes such as this, which are first on and then off, because of their sheer inhumanity? Will he say that he will pay £5 a week automatically, as of right, for every week during this winter, as the Labour party proposes?

Mr. Major: My statement reveals precisely what I have said, that I expect that a trigger point will be reached this week and people may now plan in that confident expectation. I will review the position again at the beginning of next week. With regard to the hon. Gentleman's other remarks, he may say what he likes about previous pension provision. He should bear in mind that if he continues to promote programmes to spend something like £28 billion a year while raising £3·6 billion through taxation, he will not meet those programmes.

Mr. Kennedy: I welcome the Minister's sensible announcement, which is the right announcement to make. However, as this entire scheme has become something of an annual shambles, will he consider two factors? First, will he consider changing the trigger degree to zero rather than minus 1·5 deg C? Secondly, instead of having to make special statements such as the one he has made today, will he make automatic payment to all those in the qualifying categories so that people do not have to make special application?

Mr. Major: There is already automatic payment for assistance with heating. It is the heating additions to which I have made frequent reference in the past. I make no secret of the fact that there have been difficulties with the discretionary scheme. It was precisely for that reason that we made it a statutory entitlement.

Hospitals (Non-admission)

8. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases have occurred in the last 12 months for which figures are available of patients in acute pain being refused admittance to National Health Service hospitals.

Mr. Newton: It is for the responsible doctor to decide whether, in his clinical judgment, a patient needs to be admitted to hospital. Statistics are not kept on patients who, in the doctor's clinical judgment, do not require admission, but 50 per cent. of patients judged to need admission are admitted immediately.

Mr. Janner: Does the Minister not understand that that is a pathetic failure to answer a perfectly reasonable question? Is it not right to say that there are hundreds of thousands of people who are awaiting treatment in our hospitals—8,000 of whom in Leicestershire are awaiting in-patient treatment and 15,000 awaiting out-patient treatment—and that the Government are proposing to allocate only £50 million, spread over two years, to meet this need? That is an election gimmick. What do the Government intend to do to provide adequate hospital treatment for people who are in acute need?

Mr. Newton: If the hon. and learned Gentleman looks at my answer, he will see that it was a perfectly sensible answer to his rather obscure question. On his basic point, the £50 million waiting list fund—from which I hope it will be possible to provide some help to the Leicestershire district health authority, but that will depend on our discussions with the region—will be in support of the effective efforts that authorities are already making; for example, their plans to bring additional theatres into use.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my hon. Friend agree that there are many people who suffer acute pain for many years, whether it be from varicose veins or other problems, who would be better served if money were spent on helping them instead of it being spent on much of the transplant surgery of today, in which surgeons are more inclined to be concerned with their own reputations and macho image? Would it not be better for that money to be spent helping those who are in pain rather than just upon transplant surgery? Should there not be a separate budget instead of money often being wasted on improving surgeons' reputations?

Mr. Newton: One of the difficulties that faces all Health Ministers is that of drawing a balance in all health authorities between the different considerations to which my hon. Friend has referred.

Dr. Marek: Does the Minister agree that doctors are there to treat patients; in particular, patients who are in acute pain? Will he stop the practice whereby doctors spend a considerable proportion of their time, not on treating the sick, but on telephoning other National Health Service hospitals to find out whether they can admit their patients?

Mr. Newton: I have already said that we regard it as important to reduce waiting lists and times. I believe that there are both administrative and other actions that can help towards that end, which we are trying to encourage.

Hospital Waiting Lists

9. Mrs. Roe asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps the Government have taken to help ease hospital waiting lists.

14. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any new plans to reduce hospital waiting lists.

18. Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the progress in the reduction of hospital waiting lists.

Mr. Fowler: Health authorities share the Government's commitment to make further substantial improvements in waiting lists and times. They have developed and are now implementing urgent programmes of action. They will be greatly helped in this by the £50 million waiting list fund.

Mrs. Roe: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his reply. Does he recognise that one of the features of medical treatment in the National Health Service that causes the greatest irritation to patients is the length of time that they often have to wait in doctors' surgeries? Has any review of practices within the National Health Service included advice to help to overcome this problem?

Mr. Fowler: Yes, there is irritation, although my impression is that in recent years, the position has improved quite substantially. However, waiting time is certainly one of the problems that we want to deal with.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Minister appreciate that, due to the present weather conditions, there will be severe pressure on hospital services? Does he further appreciate that in certain areas this pressure now extends into spring and mid-autumn—Mid Glamorgan is a case in point? Does the Minister recognise that, ultimately, it is a matter of inadequate funding? It is becoming more apparent every day that the NHS is not safe in the hands of this Government?

Mr. Fowler: I do not remotely accept that. The fact is that under this Government more patients—in-patients, day patients and out-patients—are being treated than at any time in the history of the Health Service. That shows the Government's commitment to the NHS.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is it not true that one way in which the Government have been able to reduce NHS waiting lists is by forcing health authorities to place their patients in private hospitals paid for by the NHS? If the money is available, why is it not spent on doing up Health Service buildings and ensuring that there are a sufficient number of consultants to carry out operations within the NHS?

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong. There have been contracts with the private sector and with voluntary hospitals since the inception of the National Health Service, and those contracts were operating under the Labour Government.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Does my right hon. Friend agree that a permanent solution to the waiting lists of the East Birmingham hospital is the earliest possible commissioning of the district general hospital at Solihull?

Mr. Fowler: I think that that will make a substantial contribution to east Birmingham and Birmingham as a whole. The go-ahead for the Solihull hospital has been welcomed locally.

Mr. Pavitt: Will the Secretary of State hold an inquiry into the closure of acute beds and the effect on waiting lists? Is he aware that one of the quickest ways of securing savings in this fiscal year is to close acute beds? All the hospitals of North-West Thames authority have been engaged in this process. Will he examine this?

Mr. Fowler: No, Sir, I will not hold an inquiry. The fact is that between 1974 and 1979 the average number of available beds fell by some 7,000 a year, but now, under this Government, that fall, on average, is about 6,000 a year. On the basis of the measures quoted by the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt), the position was considerably worse under the Labour Government.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the lengths of orthopaedic waiting lists are especially worrying? Therefore, will he have a special word with the profession, in particular the consultants, to ensure that they fully honour their commitment to the NHS? That would reduce orthopaedic waiting lists. Certainly in the Macclesfield area the list is unacceptably high at present.

Mr. Fowler: My hon. Friend is substantially right in what he has said about the worrying nature of those waiting lists. I believe that our consultants are certainly committed in wanting to reduce waiting lists. I further believe that the new initiative, the £50 million waiting list fund, will make a further contribution to reducing those lists.

Mr. Meacher: Is the Secretary of State aware that the cut of 36,000 NHS beds under this Government has already caused a substantial lengthening of waiting lists and leaves no reserve for absorbing the influx of elderly people because of the extreme cold at this time of the year? Is the Secretary of State aware that hospitals in London and the south-east are already turning away serious operation cases because they cannot cope with the number of elderly people being admitted with hypothermia, broncho-pneumonia, heart attacks or strokes? Does he realise that, because of the Government's policy of cuts, it now means that the NHS simply cannot cope with epidemics or health crises such as the present one?

Mr. Fowler: I do not accept anything of what the hon. Gentleman has just said. It is a well-known fact that the closure of beds went on at a far faster pace under the Labour Government than under this Government. The Labour Government closed a record number of beds per year. Under that Government the NHS treated fewer patients, and when they handed over to us the NHS had the biggest and longest waiting list in its history.

Trent Regional Health Authority

10. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the funding of the Trent regional health authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: We have received many representations about the funding of the Trent regional health authority. Trent is one of the regions that has received priority for funds, and I am glad to tell the House that this year—1987-88 — it will be receiving £926 million, which represents a very substantial increase indeed.

Mr. Flannery: If one takes the resource allocation working party target as being 100 per cent., which is what it always is, is it not a fact that the Trent regional health authority is the lowest-funded authority in the United Kingdom, and that many regional health authorities in the south receive as much as 12 per cent. more and as much as 8 per cent. above the target? That means that the great city of Sheffield falls below that target of 100 per cent. by at least £6 million. As a result, hospital waiting lists throughout the area, which the Minister herself lives in, are increasing because of under-funding. She should be fighting for more money to help the situation.

Mrs. Currie: On the contrary, the amount of money allocated to Sheffield has increased from £122 million to £153 million, and waiting lists in the area are being tackled very effectively, with a number of new sessions and consultants. I am satisfied that Sheffield is getting what it should get this year and is making very good use of that money.

PRIME MINISTER

Sir Richard Armstrong—Mr. Chapman Pincher (Correspondence)

Q1. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she will place in the Library a copy of all correspondence conducted on her behalf between Sir Robert Armstrong and Mr. Chapman Pincher.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): It remains inappropriate to comment on matters in issue in the Peter Wright case in Australia. I also intend to follow the precedent set by previous Governments of not commenting on security matters.

Mr. Dalyell: By what method did a Government agency first obtain the page proofs of "Their Trade is Treachery"? This is not exactly related to the current case.

The Prime Minister: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is covered by my first reply.

Mr. Adley: Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to thank the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) for constantly parading his political obsessions before us? Does she agree that they may account for the current standing in public opinion of the Labour party and its leader?

The Prime Minister: I am very grateful for the fact that I am not responsible for the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell).

Mr. Benn: Now that the Cabinet documents for 1956 have been published and are, therefore, no longer covered by any matter relating to immediate security, and now that it is clear that there was collusion then with the Israeli Government, and that——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not an open question. The question on the Order Paper is specifically about correspondence conducted between Sir Robert Armstrong and Mr. Chapman Pincher.

Mr. Benn: But with great respect, Mr. Speaker, one of the points referred to by Mr. Peter Wright in the book that is being suppressed is the attempt by MI6 to assassinate Colonel Nasser.

Engagements

Q2. Mr. Snape asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 13 January.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Snape: Will the Prime Minister find time today to initiate a proper and long-term review of severe weather payments? Will she look, in particular, at the £500 limit? Does she favour thrift, or does she not?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, severe weather payments were brought in under this Government. They are paid on top of the heating addition allowance, which amounts to some £400 million a year, compared with £90 million under the previous Labour Government. The hon. Gentleman will also be aware of the statement made earlier today by my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security:

> "It is our firm expectation that the trigger point for severe weather payments will be reached throughout the country this week. In view of this and of the unprecedented cold weather, I wish to make it clear today that the extra payment of £5 will be made to everyone in the qualifying groups for this week."

I find it encouraging that even Labour Members expect and receive a much higher standard of heating benefit for the elderly from a Conservative Government than they ever got from a Labour Government.

Mr. Hind: Will my right hon. Friend take time during the course of her busy day to look at much of the press comment about the takeover bid by BTR for Pilkington? Will she bear in mind, especially in the light of the arguments about the north-south divide, the importance of Pilkington to the north-west region and have words today with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and urge him to refer that takeover bid to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend said, that is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who must wait to receive advice from the Director General of Fair Trading.

Mr. Kinnock: The announcement by the Minister earlier today on severe weather payments was welcome, but an admission of the—[Interruption.] We are glad to get anything we can for old people who are cold. The announcement was welcome, but was an admission of the utter incompetence of the present system offered by the Prime Minister. Does she recognise that that is a hopelessly inadequate way of trying to remove the gross deficiencies of a pathetically bad system and one recognised as such by organisations representing old people as well as by the old themselves? Must we wait for weekly announcements from Ministers so that the old and the cold can live without fear of freezing? Why does the Prime Minister not scrap the present absurdly bureaucratic and inadequate system and introduce one that provides secure and consistent help to those most in need and which responds to the realities of age, cold, and a deep fear of paying bills?

The Prime Minister: First, there was no system of severe weather payments under the Labour Government. I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman expects a better standard of care from Conservative Governments than his own could possibly have given.

Secondly, the present system was referred to the Social Security Advisory Committee, which gave general support to the main elements of our proposals. It said:

"The proposals submitted to us represent a significant improvement on the previous scheme for exceptionally severe weather payments, in terms of simplicity, comprehensibility and certainty of payment."

Thirdly, when we have a totally unprecedented level of low temperatures of the sort that we have experienced recently, which were lower than ever before except in 1940, we are indeed anxious, and will waive the strict bureaucratic procedures in order—[Interruption.] That is precisely what my hon. Friend—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Prime Minister: Hon. Members do not wish to hear the truth of what has happened. Yes, we were anxious to waive the bureaucracy. As my hon. Friend the Minister said:

"I wish to make it clear today that the extra payment of £5 will be made to everyone in the qualifying groups for this week . . . The Government are determined that vulnerable groups should know without delay where they stand, so that they will not be discouraged from heating their homes during this very cold spell."

That is an excellent record and an excellent decision.

Mr. Kinnock: The people at risk, of whom there are many thousands, do not want a distorted history lesson from the Prime Minister. They want help with their heating and all her recitations from Committee minutes do not fill any bellies or warm any homes. Will the Prime Minister answer my question? Are we to wait for weekly announcements of adjustments in an incompetent policy, or will she get rid of her stupid system?

The Prime Minister: I have two further points in reply to the right hon. Gentleman. The last time that we had extremely severe weather was in 1978-79, and the heating additions then were £90 million. Today they are £400 million. At that time the Labour Government were in office and not one right hon. or hon. Gentleman raised the matter at Question Time with his own Government. Furthermore, may I remind the right hon. Gentleman that the other danger to the elderly of having insufficient heat was during the coal strike, which he supported.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Prime Minister now—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kinnock: Now, Mr. Prime Minister—[Laughter.] I am anticipating events. Will the Prime Minister now answer the question? Must we wait for a weekly announcement, or will the right hon. Lady help old people directly and consistently? Does she not recall that last year she defended that incompetent system? This year she is defending this mess. How many additional old people must die before she changes her policy?

The Prime Minister: The comparison is as follows: under the Labour Government £90 million—[Interruption.] I shall say what is happening now. [Interruption.] Obviously, the right hon. Gentleman does not want me to make the comparison. The comparison is heating additions of £90 million a year under a Labour Government with £400 million a year under this Conservative Government; no severe weather payments under that Labour Government, with generous severe weather payments under this Government, with arrangements that have just been modified to ensure that pensioners receive it; and the coal strike under Labour that deprived old people of heat, and resistance to that from a Tory Government.

York

Q3. Mr. Gregory asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to make an official visit to York,.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Mr. Gregory: Will my right hon. Friend praise the railway work force in York, which has achieved, both on the administrative and the engineering sides, such solid benefits? Furthermore, will she confirm that under the Conservative Government, in real terms, a great deal more investment is going into the railways, amounting to more than £414 million per annum, compared with a derisory £343·5 million per annum under Labour?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is aware, the Government have fully recognised the importance of the railways and since we took office British Rail has invested a total of £3 billion in modernising the railways. We are now seeing the largest ever programme for new trains. In the past three years the Government have approved nearly £1 billion of investment in major railway projects, such as the east coast main line electrification scheme. It is for those in this country to compete for new orders, and it is for British Rail to decide where the contracts are given.

Q4. Mr. Cartwright asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 13 January.

Engagements

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cartwright: Does the Prime Minister agree that in the present appalling weather we should be concerned, not only about the elderly, but about the growing number of homeless young people, of whom there are literally hundreds living rough in London alone, with council housing and private rented housing denied to them? What hope can the Government give to that growing band of homeless youngsters?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, there are a large number of council houses vacant, including some in London. Some have been vacant for over a year and one would hope that they will soon be used to house those who need them. There are legislative provisions for dealing with homelessness which bear on the duties of local authorities.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Will my right hon. Friend find time in her busy day to congratulate Crosfield Electronics in my constituency on having trebled its turnover from £60 million to nearly £200 million in three years, breaking into Japan with about 35 per cent. of the market, and having 35 per cent. of the European market and 35 per cent. of the American market, won against local competition, for computer-aided technology? Is that not a great achievement?

The Prime Minister: I know the factory to which my hon. Friend refers. I visited it about a year ago, when my hon. Friend was present. It is an impressive firm with extremely impressive achievements which have been of great benefit to its people and to the whole of Britain. I congratulate the company and wish it well in the future.

Mr. Steel: Further to the question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), will the Prime Minister recognise that the charity Crisis at Christmas had a record number of young homeless to deal with this Christmas at its soup kitchens and shelters? If, as the right hon. Lady says, there is housing available in London, will she take the time to go and look at the cardboard city on the south bank, and will she ask her Ministers to take action on the issue, which is a growing scandal?

The Prime Minister: I join the right hon. Gentleman in congratulating the charity Crisis at Christmas, which is helped by an enormous number of people. It ran a very impressive and helpful operation which brought joy to many people. In London about 28,000 homes are empty and 10,000 of them are vacant for more than a year. That has been a problem for several years and from time to time I read out the number of empty houses. Some of them are being done up for new tenants; others seem to have been empty for a very long time.

Mr. Kinnock: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is imperative that the House has the opportunity to debate the subject of severe weather payments, because thousands of people, including the constitiuents of Conservative Members, are at risk and are desperate to be able to maintain heating in their homes. [Interruption.] There is a crisis of cold in Britain that affects many old and poor people and it is not changed by the announcement that we have heard this afternoon. [Interruption.] This House must attend to that subject and I therefore want to inform you, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I may have lost my voice, but I want to be able to hear what is being said.

Mr. Kinnock: For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I want to inform you that tomorrow the Opposition intend to devote the whole of their Opposition day to debates on the condition of the old and the cold, and the problem of fuel poverty, which will endure much longer than the validity of today's announcement and still leave a basic crisis of poverty and loneliness to be answered. We shall, of course, return quickly to the failure of the Government's eonomic policies. However, anyone who knows of the fear which is now gripping so many thousands of our old people in this country must recognise the primacy of this issue for consideration by this House.

Mr. Biffen: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In many parts of the House there will be an appreciation of the topicality of the subject that has been chosen for tomorrow. I should like also to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the indication that there will be a debate on the economy because this House, especially Conservative Members, have a vested interest in that subject being debated as early as possible and in as much depth as possible. Therefore, I undertake to do my best to see that a day is made available.

Mr. Frank Cook: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I simply ask you to contrast the reception that was given to the Leader of the House as against that given to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Conway: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not the fact that the Leader of the Opposition simply wants to run away from the economic debate, and should not the House be aware that on 2 December the Opposition were not even here for the debate. — [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a matter for me.

Mr. Madden: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I raise the fact that this morning the Bracknell Met Office refused to give information about temperatures, on the ground that such information was politically contentious? I understand that the DHSS has a contract with the Met service about supplying information on temperatures. I am sure that you would be concerned as much as we would be if there were to be any suggestion that the DHSS has leant on the Met service to withhold information about temperatures. As it seems from the——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot see that what goes on at the Bracknell Met Office is anything to do with me. It is a matter that could quite legitmately, and perhaps even should, be mentioned in the debate tomorrow.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. As the Member representing Bracknell and the Met Office, I know that a large number of my constituents who serve at the Met Office would deeply resent the remarks that have just been made by the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) and I ask him to withdraw them.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We all accept that what the Leader of the Opposition had to say was about an important subject. However, if the House is to be run in a civilised and proper way, a point of order has to be either a proper point of order or it is nothing. It is either a personal statement or a request. What the Leader of the Opposition said was surely not a point of order, in the widest use of the words. Is this House to be run properly or for the use of the Opposition?

Mr. Speaker: Order. As far as I am aware, no subject for tomorrow's debate had been announced in the House, and I think that it was for the general convenience of the House, as the Leader of the House indicated, to know exactly what the subject tomorrow is to be.

Mr. Hoyle: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would it not have been better for the Minister, in making his announcement on severe weather payments, instead of relying on a fortuitous question from an Opposition Member, to have made the statement at the end of questions? That would have been fairer to you, Mr. Speaker, and would have allowed all hon. Members with an interest in the elderly to make a contribution.

Mr. Speaker: Order. These are matters that should legitimately be raised tomorrow in the debate, which I now understand is to last a full day. If the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) is fortunate, he can raise that point then.

Mr. Dykes: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Because of your loss of voice, I am sorry to ask you to guide the House further. Manifestly, the comment of the Leader of the Opposition was not a point of order. [Interruption.] I am sorry to go on, but this is an important point to do with defending the interests of the House. Having an altercation with people outside Indian restaurants is one thing, but obviously for the Leader of the Opposition having an altercation with the Prime Minister is much more difficult. We understand that.

However, he should not use a bogus point of order as an excuse to continue a debate. Since the Opposition's humbug on this issue has been shown as a result of the Government's announcement, should not a change of business be announced through the usual channels by the Leader of the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let me clear this matter. Before we adjourned for the Christmas recess, no subject for the Opposition day had been announced. As far as I am aware, since I do not receive party Whips, no subject has yet been announced. I think that it was for the general convenience of the House to know — [Interruption.] Order. The House has to know in some way or another. The only way in which it can be told is if the subject is announced by a member of the Opposition. It was perfectly legitimate to do that.

Mr. Skinner: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In order to try to clarify the issue, is it not a fact that during this Session and the previous Session the Leader of the House, on more than one occasion, has introduced a business statement under the guise of a point of order and it has been accepted by you?

We have all noticed that your voice is breaking, Mr. Speaker. You sound like the House of Commons' answer to Aled Jones. If this turns into any form of acute pain, will you assure the House that you will use a National Health Service hospital and not follow the Prime Minister and use a private one?

Mr. Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his concern about my health. However, my eyesight is fine, my hearing is fine and my memory is very good.

Mr. Dickens: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When you opened the proceedings this afternoon you said something similar to what you have just repeated—that you had trouble with your voice, but that your eyes were sharp. May we all be assured that you have had a good look at those who have taken advantage of your voice this afternoon?

Mr. Madden: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have dealt with one point of order from the hon. Gentleman. If he has another, I shall take it, but not if it deals with the same subject.

Mr. Madden: The Library cannot advise me who is ministerially responsible for the Met Office. If we wish to obtain information about temperatures, will the Table Office accept questions that the Met Office in Bracknell is apparently refusing to answer if they are made to the Department of the Environment, which is the Met Office's best guess as to who is the Minister responsible?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that the hon. Member tries that out on the Table Office. I am sure that he will be given good advice.

Rate Support Grant

3.41 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the rate support grant settlement for 1987-88 and selective rate limitation for local authorities in England.

When I made my announcement about relevant and total expenditure on 16 December, I said that no further rate support grant reports could be made until validating legislation had been approved by Parliament to allow decisions to be taken in line with the practice which had hitherto been adopted. I also said that I would make a further announcement about rate support grant when the House returned in January. I am today announcing my firm intentions for the 1987-88 settlement for England and for the supplementary reports for 1986-87 and 1985-86. These intentions are based on the powers I am taking in the Local Government Finance Bill. Copies of the explanatory material and the rate limits proposed in that Bill are being sent to local authorities today and are available in the Library and the Vote Office. Authorities will be able to plan their budgets and rates for 1987-88 with confidence. I shall make the relevant reports, and designated authorities will be notified of their rate and precept limits immediately the Local Government Finance Bill receives Royal Assent.

The consultation which has preceded the 1987-88 settlement has been much more extensive than in previous years. I have considered very carefully the comments which the local authority associations have made to me, and the many representations received from individual local authorities. I do not intend to make any major changes to my proposals of 3 December.

I deal first with the main features of the 1987-88 settlement. Since 3 December I have received further information on capital allocations for 1987-88 and about some authorities' budgets for 1986-87. This information has been taken into account in the figures I am announcing today. The figures also take into account expected higher spending by some rate and precept limited authorities to reflect the provisions of the Local Government Finance Bill. The consequence of these changes is to increase slightly the grant entitlements of most local authorities.

The aggregate of Exchequer grant to authorities will be set at the level I announced in July, £12,842 million, which is an increase of over £1 billion or 9 per cent. over the level included in the settlement for the current financial year.

My estimate of aggregate total expenditure in 1987-88 is £24,703 million. Provision for local authority current expenditure will be set at £25,251 million; this is 13 per cent. more than at settlement last year and £40 million higher than previously proposed to take account of the later information. In addition, the Government will, as the House knows, make available additional provision and grant when there is a settlement on teachers' pay which meets our requirements on cost, pay structure, and duties.

There are plenty of opportunities for authorities to reduce their expenditure, for example, by putting out services to competitive tendering or by implementing the many savings identified by the Audit Commission. I intend therefore that the aggregate of authorities' grant-related expenditure assessments should not be uplifted by the full increase in expenditure provision but should be held broadly steady in real terms.

I intend to specify the same principles for GREs as were proposed in the 3 December consultation paper. The most significant change from 1986-87 is that the police GRE will be distributed on the basis of police establishments.

I intend that the slope of the grant-related poundage schedule will stay the same as this year. This will provide an incentive for authorities to restrain their expenditure.

As usual there will be arrangements to limit the impact of year-on-year changes on individual authorities grant entitlements. It is my intention that there should be a limit on block grant losses of 7p at ratepayer level and a limit of 12p on gains.

In July, I announced my intention to introduce legislation which would provide local authorities with greater certainty about their grant entitlement. A Bill will be introduced shortly to abolish the arrangements known as grant recycling whereby grant not claimed is redistributed to all authorities. In future, an authority's grant will depend on its own expenditure and not on the expenditure of all other authorities. At the same time, the abolition of grant recycling will mean a tougher regime for high spending authorities which will no longer receive a paradoxical and unconvenanted benefit through recycling.

Local authorities can claim the full amount of grant if they spend in line with the settlement spending assumption. We have increased the amount of Exchequer grant by over £1 billion for next year, and authorities have a very clear choice about whether to be prudent and claim their entitlement or to spend up and lose grant.

I shall make the third supplementary report for 1985-86 and the first supplementary report for 1986-87 when I make the main rate support grant report. It is my intention that the supplementary report for 1985-86 will adjust grant to take account of provisional outturn expenditure and certain changes in education pool contributions. Most authorities have brought their spending closer to target, and as a result £385 million of grant so far withheld for 1985-86 will be paid out. The supplementary report for 1986-87 will distribute the block grant underclaim of some £618 million consequent upon the estimates of total expenditure received from authorities on or before 19 December. My predecessor guaranteed that at least £500 million of grant would be recycled in the first supplementary report for 1986-87. This report will therefore honour that guarantee.

I now turn to the authorities selected for rate limitation in 1987-88. The House will know, from my statement on 16 December and from yesterday's debate on the Second Reading of the Local Government Finance Bill, that rate limitation is to be dealt with — for 1987-88 only — in accordance with the terms of the proposed legislation.

The Department is today writing to the 20 high-spending authorities selected for rate limitation, informing them individually of the rate limit figure which flows from the Local Government Finance Bill and my intention for rate support grant. Each of those councils will therefore be able to set its rate in good time before 1 April, within the figure being notified to it.

In the case of the 20 joint authorities which are automatically selected for precept limitation under the Local Government Act 1985, Departments with responsibility for those authorities will be writing to them with similar information about the precept limits produced by the formulae in the Bill. The present system of local government finance is short on accountability and long on complexity. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]

Our Green Paper proposals will replace it. While the present system lasts, I commend this settlement to the House as the best that can be achieved. Prudent and responsible local authorities which contain their expenditure can keep rate increases low. The Government are providing more than an extra £1 billion in grant. How much rates will rise is for the local authorities; they have the opportunity to keep the rates low this year. If authorities choose to spend high, it will be their fault that the rates go up. In the profligate high-spending authorities, ratepayers will benefit considerably from the important protections provided by rate limitation.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): The Secretary of State made a long and complicated statement, but I can begin—as can all my right hon. and hon. Friends—by joining him in his condemnation of the present rate support grant system — a system that is solely the creation of the Government and all those hon. Members who said, "Hear, hear" to the Secretary of State's comments. They voted for the system and have supported it since its creation.

Is the Secretary of State aware that, because of the Government's incompetence, major problems and uncertainties for all local authorities result from the especially late statement that he has made on rate support grant? There will be particular difficulties for those authorities snared by the Rates Act 1984. Is he aware also that, in his treatment of those authorities, there is no natural justice and a denial of the promises made to the House by the right hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin), not only in piloting the legislation through the House, but in subsequent letters to local authorities and to me as the shadow Environment Secretary? What has the right hon. Gentleman to say to the House about that matter?

Is the Secretary of State aware that the Local Government Finance Bill, which was given a Second Reading yesterday, is complex and difficult? In his statement, he assumed that the Bill will go through the House and, more important perhaps, through another place without a single change or amendment being made to it. Is that not a breathtakingly arrogant assumption to make, given the nature of the legislation?

Will the Secretary of State recognise that his decision to maintain grant at 46 per cent. of expenditure shows the beginnings of recognition by the Government of the validity of local government spending? Why has it taken seven years for this recognition to arrive on the Treasury Bench, especially since, in those seven years, cuts of £17·5 billion have been made in rate support grant? Why does the right hon. Gentleman seek to disguise the end of grant recycling and its implications? Is he not aware that Mr. Brian Tanner, the county treasurer of Somerset, has forecast that the end of grant recycling will reduce his often-mentioned extra £1 billion by at least £400 million? Is he aware that many other people in local government view the reduction as likely to be more than half the extra money he boasts about? Is he not seeking to disguise that fact because the Treasury plans to recoup at least half the extra money he claims to provide to local authorities?

Why has the Secretary of State changed the claim he made to the House last July that there would be no need for any rates increase as a result of his rate support grant settlement? In the final part of his statement, did he not recognise that rates increases will not only occur but be inevitable as a result of the Government's policies? When will the right hon. Gentleman publish the Bill to end grant recycling? With what other matters will that legislation deal?

Will the Secretary of State explain why he claims that these latest proposals, which he said resulted only from consideration of new and more relevant information and data, disguise the fact that he is reallocating more money as a result of his manipulation of the safety nets and multipliers than he is as a result of any consideration of any new information? The reality is that more than twice as much of the money reallocated results from the manipulation of the multipliers as could be attributed to any new information.

Is the Secretary of State aware that we condemn his ever-widening use of the Rates Act, this time applying to more local authorities and bodies than ever before—40 in total? Do his figures for rate limits take into account the bombshell announced in December in which calculations of housing subsidy for maintenance of council houses were changed, thus denying inner city boroughs, such as Camden, Islington and Brent, of many millions of pounds for crucial house maintenance and repair? Given the difficulties that result not only from the statement's complexity and lateness but from the widening use of the Rates Act, why has not the Secretary of State been more open about the Government's intentions on teachers' pay? Is it not a reality that, if settlement of that matter comes after local authorities have fixed their rates, they will face grave difficulties? Since the right hon. Gentleman has commented on the Government's resolve to protect ratepayers, will he say why last year's public expenditure White Paper did not take realistic account of the level of local government expenditure? Will tomorrow's be any more realistic?

Finally—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] It is always a mistake to say "finally", even when one's comments are significantly shorter than those of the Secretary of State. Does not the Secretary of State recognise that the real reason why rates are and remain a problem for people is the failure of the Government's policies, the massive switching of burdens from taxpayers to ratepayers, and the Government's ineptitude in dealing with local government finance?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman has asked many questions, and I shall try to answer them briefly. I am delighted to hear his support for changing this system getting stronger and stronger. We shall expect him to be with us in the Division Lobby when the Bill to abolish rates in England and Wales is introduced shortly after the election. He will then be able to reflect his dislike of the system in his vote.

The consultation on this settlement has been greater than on any previous occasion. [Laughter.] That is not a bad thing or something to be laughed at. If we have consultation, it is right that we should listen to all hon. Gentlemen's comments and, if necessary, act on them. I think that many hon. Members will be grateful for the fact that I did that.

The hon. Gentleman asked about rate limits. Consultation on rate limits had already taken place when authorities that wished to apply for redetermination saw officials or Ministers and, after consideration of those representations, the formulae in the Bill were inserted. Had it not been for the Bill having to be brought forward, I should now be making a final determination, having consulted those rate-limited authorities that applied for redetermination, which were not all of them. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman says that it would be different. That is right, but for many of them it is higher than it would have been because, as he knows, we have had to keep them all to the same increase in each class. That means that some of them have got higher rate limits than they might otherwise have received. That is borne out by the figure in my statement of an extra £40 million provision. Because of rate capping and precept limitation, the figure is actually £50 million less a £10 million adjustment for authorities spending less this year than they expected.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the change in the GRE in relation to the treatment of rent in London. This change was made at the suggestion of the Association of London Authorities, and for that reason I cannot understand why he should complain about it.

The hon. Gentleman asked why I assumed that the Bill would go through. If the Bill does not go through, no rate support grant will be payable next year, nor will it be possible to pay back the £385 million of holdback that is due to be paid back under the 1985-86 report. That is held up until the Bill becomes law. Massive sums of money for local authorities are at stake under the Bill and I would not have thought that any Member of either House would wish to obstruct progress of the Bill because of the geat damage to local authorities which would result if that money could not be paid.

We would never have produced more than an extra £1 billion of rate support grant if it had not been proposed to abolish grant recycling. The two go together and I hope that not one penny of that money comes back. I hope that every authority will spend at the level of the settlement assumption and not above it. Even that, at 5·25 per cent. above this year's cost—that is, 1·5 per cent. more than inflation—is a very large increase in spending.

The hon. Gentleman asked about rates. If all authorities spend at the settlement assumption, then the average—I repeat average—percentage increase in rate precepts will be 1·2 per cent. which is much less than the rate of inflation. If authorities spend at the settlement assumption, there will be an average reduction in rate bills in real terms.

The recycling Bill will be published very soon. One small but I think uncontroversial change is necessary, but otherwise it contains only provisions to end grant recycling.

The hon. Gentleman asked about teachers' pay. The Department of Education and Science will shortly provide local authority associations with details of the cost of the settlement on teachers' pay and details of the grant towards it. Those details are based on the statement which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science made on 30 October. If the settlement is as my right hon. Friend predicted on 30 October, the full financial consequences will be with authorities very soon, and that will enable them to set their budgets and rates in plenty of time before the deadline.

Finally, the hon. Gentleman asked about the public expenditure White Paper. He must wait to see that White Paper when it is published tomorrow. As with all things to do with this Government, he will find it sensible, workmanlike and realistic.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): I thank the Secretary of state for listening to our representations and responding to them, and for the safety net provisions, but will he bear in mind the particular problem of Bedfordshire—the education debt provision—which has been with us for many years and is likely to continue? Will he continue to try to find a solution to that problem?

Mr. Ridley: I note what my hon. Friend says. I know that there are special difficulties in Bedfordshire. It is not one of the most fortunate areas in terms of the settlement. That is a result of the swings and roundabouts and the complexities in the rate support grant settlement, but I shall certainly bear in mind the problem about education that he mentioned.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Is it not highly reprehensible that six weeks' reflection on the previous statement by the Secretary of State has not brought any change in the highly unfair and biased allocation that he proposed then and which will benefit certain shire counties? Surely the Government's love of things American ought not to lead them to introduce the pork barrel system of politics by assisting those who might well support them at the ballot box.

Is it not also rather strange that the Secretary of State should say in his statement that it is his firm intention to carry out the 1987-88 settlement when he gives us no knowledge of the effect of the powers that he will take to himself in the Act about the accounting systems of local government and what effect that might well have on local government finances in the following year?

Does not the right hon. Gentleman accept that to base the grant-related expenditure for the police on police establishments relates it to something which is at least in contention if not highly questionable in many local authorities which complain about the establishment of the police? Is it not highly sceptical to think that one can bring significant benefit from compulsion in regard to competitive tendering? That will not bring any significant savings to local government. Is it not amazing to suggest that the local government system is short on accountability and long on complexity when the truth is that it is short on accountability to local electors and certainly long on compulsion by the Government? That is the heart of the problem.

Mr. Ridley: I am amazed by the hon. Gentleman's first question, because he does not seem to know that between parts of England south and north of the Severn-Wash line about £1 billion of grant is transferred from the south to the north. He may be interested to know that this settlement gives an extra £381 million to counties and authorities north of that line, and only £148 million to counties south of the line. He talks about pork barrel politics in the Tory shire counties, but he ought to be aware that this is one of the best settlements ever reached for northern authorities and industrial cities.

I am fully aware that the settlement and the payment of grant to local authorities depends upon the Local Government Finance Bill receiving Royal Assent in a form very similar to the form it is in at present. The hon. Gentleman and the Opposition will have to consider carefully whether they want to take their heady opposition to the point where they might seriously risk depriving local authorities of grant on time.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the police. The West Yorkshire police authority could reduce its rate by 0·2 per cent. if it spent at the settlement assumption and the precept limit in the Bill.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): My right hon. Friend will know that many critics have suggested that the rate support grant would be geared in the direction of the south. On behalf of the people of Cleveland, I should like to thank him for his statement about the rate support grant. That county is being treated in the most generous way of all the counties and has an additional bonus because of the saving of Smith's Dock and ITM. There will be rate income from those two large organisations this year. That would otherwise have been lost. As a consequence, the people of Cleveland who now have a decent allowance will be able to look forward to a reduction in their rates.

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and pleased to hear the authoritative voice of the north speaking accurately and truthfully. My hon. Friend is quite right. If Cleveland spends at the settlement assumption, it will gain a further £15 million in grant and will be able to reduce its rate by 4·1 per cent. I hope that after a few years of the operation of the new urban development corporation on Teesside the companies about which my hon. Friend spoke will create sufficient rateable value to give an extra boost to that part of the world.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Since yesterday's debate, has the Minister had time to read his Bill? If he has finally managed to read it, does he not recognise that the draconian measures that he is taking upon himself, the retrospective nature of the Bill and the clauses that will prevent the courts from being used in the way in which they have always been used in Britain will obviously not be acceptable to many noble Lords? It is unlikely that the Bill will go through without being significantly amended. Is it not therefore arrogant to make the kind of statement that he has made today on the basis of the Bill going through unamended? Is he aware that capital allocations are totally inadequate and that, for instance, in Sefton, because of this settlement, they have had to stop letting out contracts? How can the so-called party of law and order take £6 million from the Merseyside police authority when crime has increased by 40 per cent. during the lifetime of this Government?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman may have read the Bill, but he has certainly not understood it. Nor have his right hon. and hon. Friends. The elements of retrospection and judge-proofing that they alleged yesterday were totally disproved by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland who closed the debate with distinction and clarity. If he does not understand the Bill, he would do better to keep quiet on the matter. Sefton can reduce its rates by 3·3 per cent. if it spends at the settlement assumption. I cannot see what is wrong with that.

Mr. Timothy Raison (Aylesbury): My right hon. Friend has referred to the weaknesses in the rate support grant system—we would all agree with that—but is not one of the weaknesses that updated population figures are not used in the final settlement when they could be? Is that not unfair to counties of increasing population, such as Buckinghamshire?

Mr. Ridley: All population figures are taken into account at a certain stage. They have to work their way into the data upon which the whole operation is based. However, the effect of a cap on grant gains and making a quicker appreciation of population changes would, of course, be working in the opposite direction and would cancel each other out.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): For all the Secretary of State's talk of complexity and consultation, and for all the twists and turns of the succession of Secretaries of State, is it not a simple fact that the Government are proposing a total Exchequer grant, including that to the police, of £12·8 billion out of a total anticipated expenditure of £27·7 billion? By my calculation, that is less than 46 per cent. of total expected expenditure. That is compared with 61 per cent. which was the figure of Government support for local authorities when the Government came into office. Is that not a massive reduction in support for local government and local services?

Mr. Ridley: The total provision is not £27 billion, as the hon. Gentleman said, but some £25 billion, of which the approximately £12·8 billion rate support grant represents precisely 46·4 per cent.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): Is my right hon. Friend aware that it is possible at one and the same time to congratulate him on maintaining the present level of support for local authorities, at least while we have the present system, to join with him in wishing that the present system could be profoundly changed and to disagree deeply with him about the present proposals to change that system?

Mr. Ridley: It is possible for my hon. Friend to do that, but only for a short while longer, before he has to tell us how he prefers to see the system changed.

Mr. Reg Freeson (Brent, East): I have a simple question for the Secretary of State. In the light of the settlement that he has announced, will there be more or less expenditure on repairs, renewal and maintenance of the building stock—housing, schools and other public buildings—in the inner city areas in particular, one of which I represent?

Mr. Ridley: With the best will in the world, it is not a simple question, because a large part of repair and maintenance is treated as current expenditure out of the rent account and a large part of this is capitalised and treated as capital expenditure. My complaint is that too much of what should have been maintenance is turned into capital dereliction because it has not been done in the past. It is impossible to give an answer related to current only. I can only say that the right hon. Gentleman will find a large increase in the capital provision for housing repair and renovation; together with this large increase in rate support grant settlement, he will find that the money available for housing, both current and capital, is greatly increased in real terms over the previous year.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Will my right hon. Friend send to any Member who alleges that he understands his statement a tin of the new parliamentary humbugs? Will he send to the rest of us a clear translation, indicating how it affects our individual areas?

Mr. Ridley: I do not know whether my hon. Friend is suggesting that I should send myself a tin of humbugs. I would certainly be delighted to spend as much time as he likes with him or with any other hon. Member explaining how the system works, although there must be a time limit on that because we will soon replace the system with a better one.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): Will the Secretary of State confirm that as a result of his announcement today the City of Birmingham district council, the biggest in England, will not be allowed to spend as much as it should spend according to the Government's own assessment of what needs to be spent in Birmingham?

Mr. Ridley: The settlement for Birmingham is an extra £30·861 million over the present grant if it spends at the settlement assumption, which enables Birmingham to reduce its rates by 4·8 per cent., not in real terms but in cash terms, which is the best result of any authority under this settlement. It is just a little bit greedy for Birmingham to believe that it should have more when that more can come only from the constituencies of other hon. Members.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): My right hon. Friend will be aware that if he gives more to Birmingham he will take even more from east Sussex where, in spite of an impeccable performance — by the Government's own statistics east Sussex has performed better in cutting its expenditure over the past five years than any other county —he has reduced absolutely the rate support grant. We have been told recently that this has come about for a number of reasons, among them an alteration, seemingly arbitrary, in the way in which children between the ages of 0 and 15 are calculated for the purpose of rate support grant—which does not bode well for the young people. Indeed, the absolute reduction does not bode well for any of the people in east Sussex.

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend does not have too bad a result for east Sussex. He can look forward to a rate increase of only 2·5 per cent. if the county council spends at the settlement assumption. That is a better result than many hon. Gentlemen will have for their authorities. I do not think that it is too bad.

The GREs are constantly being negotiated with all authorities and their associations, and we tend to try to do what the authorities want. But the consequences of that are not always good for every authority. There is always a bit of swings and roundabouts in it. In east Sussex I am sure that we can find some GRE changes which would be to the benefit of the county. It is a pity to pick on only one rather than to look at the overall position.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Will the Secretary of State, taking into consideration the answer that he gave to one of his hon. Friends, look at the situation which affects Barnsley metropolitan borough council? Since the census was taken in, I think, 1981, the cost of certain undertakings and the whole atmosphere and situation in Barnsley have changed. For instance, it is now 12th as regards children under 18 in care. It has the fourth highest percentage of people over the age of 75. It has the highest percentage of unemployment, which has risen by 72 per cent. compared with 32 per cent. on average. Should not consideration be given to these factors, which have changed since the census was taken?

Mr. Ridley: All those factors are taken into account in the GREs, including the population statistics of the various age groups. They are agreed with the local authority associations and we decide how best to take cognisance of them. It would be wrong, having had those data fed into the construction of the GREs, then to seek to have a special increase because it is felt that the results are not satisfactory for one's own authority.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I am sure that my right hon. Friend will agree that anything to do with rates is a minefield and that recent statements by the Government have not reduced the number of explosives. Does he agree that his most recent statement does not seem to have paid tribute to those responsible authorities, like mine in the borough of Macclesfield, which have met the successive requirements of Governments of all shades and complexions? Will he direct his remarks to capital receipts, which are of immense benefit to my authority? If that authority was able to spend them, not only would they generate additional revenue but they would reduce unemployment and make my area of the north-west more efficient, which is totally in line with the requirements of the Government.

Mr. Ridley: I hereby and without condition pay full tribute to all those authorities which are frugal, prudent, sensible and economical. I wish that we could spend more time on them instead of on some of the councils represented by the Labour party which are becoming so extraordinary that the House not only has to talk about them but has to legislate about them, to the great detriment of the good authorities. I take my hon. Friend's point entirely.

On capital receipts, the results that my hon. Friend mentions would not flow through. If we were to release a greater proportion of capital receipts, authorities would have to borrow to find the cash. So, although they could save money, as it were, in the ways he has suggested——

Mr. Winterton: It is on deposit now.

Mr. Ridley: I do not think it is. Only a very small proportion of the £8 billion of capital receipts is on deposit. The rest does not really exist because it is being used to repay debt, either external debt or internal debt.

Mr. Michael Hancock (Portsmouth, South): Can the Secretary of State explain how a county like Hampshire, which for the last seven years has followed to the letter Government diktats, should still suffer considerable grant loss? Despite the opportunities outlined in paragraph 7 of his statement, just to hold the line on the current level of service will mean a rate increase in double figures. How can the Secretary of State make such a statement about capital receipts when Portsmouth, which has over £40 million in capital receipts, is unable to spend it? Should he give the authority power to release that expenditure, it could not only bring down unemployment but greatly improve the housing position in that city.

Mr. Ridley: I am surprised by that. I understand that Alliance members on Hampshire county council recently voted against accepting the lowest tender for providing a service when it had gone out to competitive tender. How dare the hon. Gentleman make any such point?

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): In regard to the receipts from council house sales, does the problem not stem from the absurd way in which the Government treated the receipts as a reduction in public expenditure? Essentially it has been a means of financing the PSBR. It means that the Government have been borrowing from local authorities. Surely it is time we got this straightened out and enabled local authorities to have more access to the money which they have.

Mr. Ridley: The total of local authority capital indebtedness is, from memory, about £33 billion. So if £33 billion is owed by local authorities to those from whom they borrow, it would be unlikely that one would find large amounts of capital receipts in the banks or on deposit, although there are some. Therefore, I do not think it is a question of a system of accounting; it is a question of local authorities not having the money from capital receipts because they have used it to repay debts.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Is not the Secretary of State aware that there is probably about £6 billion of accumulated capital receipts in local authority bank accounts all round the country? The right hon. Gentleman has not the foggiest idea of how local government finance works. Before he insults the House with his arrogant, laid-back approach, showing his total ignorance of the problems of local authorities, he should get the facts right.

Mr. Ridley: No one could call the hon. Gentleman laid back or relaxed; he seems to be working himself into a frenzy. In fact, he is wrong. There is not some £6 billion of receipts in bank accounts. Local authorities, very prudently and properly, have used their capital receipts to repay their debts.

Sir Julian Ridsdale (Harwich): Will my right hon. Friend examine again the position in Essex? Is he aware that in my constituency and in many parts of Essex many people on small fixed incomes will be adversely affected by his failure to understand the position? If Essex county council is able to keep its spending under GRE, will he reconsider the position and treat the council sympathetically?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend and other hon. Gentlemen who represent Essex constituencies have discussed this with me, but I must point out that Essex is increasing its spending and is not one of the authorities which comes entirely into the category that I commended in my response to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton). It has to be considered how the county council has allowed its spending to get out of control. Even as it is, the county council will have to make only a 6·3 increase in rates if it spends at the settlement assumption, but that assumption in the case of Essex is rather high.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Will the Secretary of State confirm that Bradford is suffering the second biggest cut in grant of any metropolitan district in England? Will he also agree that, unless that cut is restored and unless the Government agree to fund properly the West Yorkshire police, fire and transport authorities, Bradford ratepayers will face a very big demand this year? Will he now reconsider the request that I made to him last August to meet representatives of Bradford council so that they may bring to his attention the unique problems and demands of the area and he can reconsider restoring the cut in grant which his statement will inflict upon the city?

Mr. Ridley: I am getting more and more to hear what the language of the Labour party is. I ask the House to listen to this; a cut for Bradford in rate support grant is an increase of £10·426 million; a cut in the West Yorkshire police authority's grant is an increase of £5·436 million; a cut in the West Yorkshire fire authority's grant is an increase of £0·229 million; a cut in the West Yorkshire tranport authority's grant is an increase of £1·778 million. How those figures can conceivably be described as a cut absolutely defeats me.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his proposals for Nottinghamshire, which at present has a Labour-controlled authority? Is it correct to say that his proposals will give that county an increase of about £22 million, or the equivalent of a 10p or 11p rate? If I am correct, is it not appalling that the county should consider any increase in its rates for next year?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The extra grant for Nottinghamshire, if it spends its settlement assumption, is £22·119 million which would enable it to cut its rates by 10·7 per cent. It is an extremely favourable result for Nottinghamshire. Whether it lies north of the Severn-Humber line I rather doubt, so it has done extremely well. I urge it publicly to show a big cut in its rate so that it can increase the confidence of business to expand and provide more jobs for the citizens of Nottingham.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Does the Secretary of State agree that the spending of authorities governed by the second formula in schedule 2 of the Bill varies from 1·6 per cent. above GREA to 70 per cent. above GREA? Will he therefore consider in Committee amendments that would reduce those anomalies? In respect of the London borough of Newham, which cannot put up its rates further, why has he today reduced the block grant figure announced in December from £96 million to £92·7 million? In view of the inner city problems experienced by the borough of Newham, does that not mean a reduction which the borough cannot bear? Why is he reducing the amount that the borough can spend since last month?

Mr. Ridley: The local rate in Newham is already 66 per cent. above the class average. I have never heard a word from any of the representatives of Newham in this House about the requirements and needs of the ratepayers. I should have thought that it was about time that the hon. Gentleman recognised that the ratepayers exist. It follows therefore that if we increase their spending under the Local Government Finance Bill, the grant will go down because all authorities that increase spending will lose grant. That is part of the rate support grant system.

Several Hon. Members rose

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will call the four hon. Members who have been rising regularly. I ask for brief questions, because we must move on.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Will my right hon. Friend introduce a tougher monitoring scheme for those lucky rate-capped authorities and the next top 20 high spenders? Is he aware that the citizens in Leicestershire believe that if Leicester city council had been rate capped last year they would not be losing £547,000 this year?

Mr. Ridley: I understand my hon. Friend's concern. Leicester has been a rough story. However, I can tell him that Leicestershire has this year received a big increase in grant that will help to keep down the total rate bill for my hon. Friend's constituents.

I want to correct a mistake that I made about Sefton in response to the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts). I said that the rates could go down by 3·3 per cent. I should have said that they could go up by that amount.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): My right hon. Friend, I know, is well aware of the situation in Northamptonshire which, he will agree, is difficult. He knows that as a result of the teachers' settlement there is likely to be an increased cost of between £10 million and £12 million. Could my right hon. Friend tell the House what proportion of that cost will be met by central Government or by the taxpayer, and how that proportion of the cost will be calculated? As a simple matter, could he say that it would be at least 40 per cent.?

Mr. Ridley: I think that Northamptonshire has had a very unfortunate result from the settlement and I find it difficult to explain precisely why. My hon. Friend's authority has probably suffered more than any other.

With regard to the teachers' settlement, the first part of the cost that relates to the current financial year 1986-87, the proportion that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science said would be met by grant, was 46·4 per cent. That is the same as for the settlement. The proportion for the following year, 1987-88, is slightly less. The details of these figures will be sent to all local authorities very soon and my right hon. Friend will be writing to them.

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): Local government will no doubt welcome the extra £1 billion by way of grant entitlement that will come from the taxpayer to increase grant entitlement. Indeed, I also welcome that extra £1 billion. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that Norfolk, a traditionally economic local authority, will have its grant entitlement increased as a result of his announcement this afternoon and thus prove that it pays to run a tight ship for the benefit of ratepayers and, in particular, of commerce and industry within the area that I represent?

Mr. Ridley: I can confirm that Norfolk has received a good result from the settlement and that it receives a further £14·059 million of grant which enables the county to reduce its rate precept by 1·4 per cent. if it spends at the settlement assumption. I am happy to pay tribute to the stewardship of Norfolk county council.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Speaking in the debate at the point to which I have become accustomed, may I thank my right hon. Friend——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is not usually called last.

Mr. Bowen Wells: Anyway, I am pleased to take part in the statement. I must thank my right hon. Friend and the Minister of State, who have genuinely consulted with Hertfordshire about the rate support grant, for putting in place the necessary adjustments which have saved £8 million of the proposed reduction in the rate support grant for Hertfordshire of £15 million.

So that we do not have to go through this wretched business of consultation, become angry and bother my right hon. Friend perhaps unnecessarily, will my right hon. Friend assure us that the same safeguards will be included in the rate support grant settlement next year and the year after until we introduce a new system? That would stop us from having to go through this wretched business again and again.

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's comments. I was tempted to think that it would be nice if he could make the statement and not simply take part in it. However, perhaps that would be going too far.

We cannot begin to consider next year's rate support grant settlement this afternoon. We have had enough difficulty with the complexity of the present settlement. However, I note my hon. Friend's comments. We must ensure that the rather creaking system can be made to last the very few years until a better system is put in place following a successful general election and the passage of the English rates Bill.

Capital Punishment (Murder of Children)

4.37 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make it a capital offence to commit the murder of a child.

It is the inescapable duty of the state to protect its children, in the most effective way that is available to it, from unlawful sexual abuse, violence and murder. The Royal Commission on Capital Punishment, which reported in 1953, described murder as the gravest of all crimes and capital punishment as the gravest of punishments for the gravest of all crimes. The murder of a child is, in terms of public concern, an outrage and the gravest and most detestable of all crimes.

I contend that, if it became part of our law once again, capital punishment would, by its deterrent effect, reduce the number of child murders. I also contend that the knock-on effect of the death penalty would deter violence and abuse towards children. Evil people who prey on children are usually cowards to pick on a defenceless child. Cowards understand the fear of death. That fear has a powerful influence over all human beings. Was is not Dr. Johnson who said that nothing concentrates the mind so much as the imminent fear of execution? I submit that nothing is more likely to make the child abuser and potential child murderer pause before interfering with a child than the knowledge that if he or she kills he or she may suffer death.

Those who oppose capital punishment always call for evidence of the deterrent effect of the death penalty knowing that they sit on safe ground. Let me explain. Someone who may have considered murdering a child but is frightened off by the thought of the death penalty will never appear as a statistic. How could he? However, in 1953 the Royal Commission concluded that the deterrent effect of capital punishment was stronger than that of any other punishment available for murder. Common sense tells us that the increase in child abuse, violence and murder has been staggering since the death penalty was abolished.

Despite all the strong measures taken by the Government, the state is simply not protecting its children to the satisfaction of public opinion. In 1985, 125 people were charged with the murder of a child. Most of the arguments that have been put forward over the years by those opposing capital punishment fall to the ground, like a pack of cards, when applied to the murder of a child. Some believe that convicted terrorists, if executed, would become martyrs. Others have made pleas for murders of passion, and so on. Another defence is that mistakes may be made. Which convicted child murderer has ever been released from prison because it was felt that a mistake had been made at the trial? Many have been released, only to kill again. Others have killed fellow prisoners. Few of the arguments against capital punishment apply when considering it for the murder of a child.

My next remarks are directed to my own Front Bench. In 1983, the then Home Secretary, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) said:

"If the House votes for the restoration of capital punishment for any category of offence, the Government will provide drafting assistance for a private Member's Bill designed to give effect to the expression of opinion of the House and will provide time for the Bill to be debated."—[Official Report, 13 July 1983; Vol. 45, c. 892.]

If I am granted the leave of the House, whether unopposed or opposed, to present my Bill, I am justly entitled to expect the Government to honour that commitment and help me with parliamentary drafting services and parliamentary time. If my Bill receives the approval of Parliament today, the Government may wish to consider inserting a new clause in the Criminal Justice Bill.

The recent return of the child murderess Myra Hindley to the Saddleworth moor in my constituency has reopened painful wounds for many families and also for my constituents who live close to those moors. We must always remember that throughout the country there are hundreds of parents who have had their children snatched from play and murdered or never seen again. The thoughts and prayers of this House should be for them all.

The death penalty would have been a most appropriate sentence for Myra Hindley, Ian Brady and others like them if it had been the law at the time of their sentence. A very strong case can be made out for it. We might have saved the lives of Lesley Ann Downey and John Kilbride if the Labour Government of the day had not diluted the deterrent at the time of their killing. They undermined that deterrent by giving notice of their plans to abolish the death penalty. I suspect that Hindley and Brady took a gamble. They were right. They did not have to face the death penalty at the time of their sentence because the Labour Government had removed it.

I have a vision that once again the United Kingdom will be safe for our women to walk freely, without fear of being molested and raped, that our elderly will feel safe after dark and inside their own homes, and that our children will be able to play safely, unafraid of being abused or murdered. My vision will become a reality only if we take a tough line with the criminals, as we do with the defence of the realm. This Bill provides the opportunity for Parliament to make a start today by protecting children. I hope that hon. Members will give me leave to present my Bill for the sake of children everywhere.

4.44 pm

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): We are in an election year. The hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) has a marginal seat which backs on to Saddleworth moor. That is why he has introduced this Bill. His remarks about the Labour Government of 1964 were pathetic. The murder of Leslie Ann Downey took place on Boxing Day 1964. The Labour Government had then been in office for fewer than eight weeks. To say that the incoming Labour Government took away the deterrent shows the nonsense of the hon. Gentleman's case. There was capital punishment at that time for certain forms of murder. But capital punishment has never been a deterrent. When they hanged pickpockets on Tyburn hill a crowd of 10,000 surrounded the cart, and when the noose pulled the man up into the air all the pickpockets in the crowd chose that moment to dip their hands into the pocket of the man in front. Capital punishment did not deter people from stealing sheep. The statistics prove it.

The hon. Gentleman is trying to bring back capital and non-capital murder. He wants capital punishment for certain types of offence. We had that in this country for nine years, and at the end of the experiment Lord Chief Justice Parker said that it was an absolute fiasco that there should be capital punishment for murder involving shooting, for the theft of money, or for killing a policeman or a prison warder, but that there should not be capital punishment for the crime of poisoning. The jury had to decide, but all too often the jury dodged it and refused to convict.

How does one define the age of a child? Is somebody 15 years and 364 days old classed as a child? What happens if a person aged 16 years and one day is murdered? Is he also classed as a child? If the child who is murdered is one day over the limit, does it mean that the murderer gets away with it? What nonsense that would be.

Experience in the United States shows that when two states that are side by side—for example, Rhode Island and Massachusetts or Maine and New Hampshire whose people are in the same income groups—have capital punishment in one state but not in the other, the murder rate is exactly the same in both states. In the case of two thirds of the murders in this country, the murderer knows his victim, and one third of murders take place within the family.

Often they are crimes of passion. Does the hon. Gentleman think that the death penalty would deter crimes of passion? It did not deter crimes of passion when we had the death penalty. Albert Pierrepoint, who hanged 400 murderers, said that the death penalty was no deterrent but a desire for revenge. It is more than a desire for revenge in the case of the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth. It is also a desire for votes, but his revenge would be carried out by somebody else; the hon. Gentleman would not carry out the sentence himself.

This is the first step towards the introduction of hanging for many more crimes, including terrorism and the IRA. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Conservative Members cheer. There is nothing that the IRA would like more than the reintroduction of hanging. The IRA would vote for it, hostages would be kidnapped weeks before a trial took place. There would be demonstrations outside the prison and television cameras would be there all the time.

Timothy Evans was hanged——

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): For the murder of a child.

Mr. Ashton: He murdered a child, yes, but they hanged the wrong man. When the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) was Home Secretary 16 years later he had to give Evans a pardon, but by then it was too late. There have been strong doubts in many other cases: for example, in the case of David Cooper and Michael McMahon; of Patrick Meehan; of John Preece, who was released in 1973 after having served eight and a half years; and of William Leighton. They would all have been dead and it would have been too late. They were found innocent but it would have been too late.

In history, all too often, the murderer who was hanged got the sympathy. Those people who demonstrated at the gates to save Ruth Ellis remember her and not her victim. It would be the same if Myra Hindley had gone down in history as the last woman to be hanged—she would not be regarded with the same revulsion as she is now. Indeed, the British people are determined to keep her in gaol for many long years because that punishment is far worse than hanging.

The hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth is seeking to play on people's emotions because a general election is coming up.

Over many years, the House has discussed this problem, people have sat down together in a sane and responsible way to discuss it and each time they have rejected capital punishment.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 19 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at Commencement of Public Business):—

The Army

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

5.1 pm

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. John Stanley): It is almost a year since our last Army debate, and that year has been an important one for the Army. In Northern Ireland, it saw the security forces having to meet the most serious challenge to law and order for more than 10 years, and meeting it successfully. It saw our first major overseas exercise outside the NATO area since the Falklands conflict. Indeed, 1986 saw further new items of equipment coming into general Army use; in particular the much lighter SA80 rifle with its sophisticated telescopic sight, the new combat helmet, the S10 respirator, and new portable and lightweight thermal imaging equipment. Moreover, 1986 saw a good level of recruiting, a welcome levelling off in the rate of applications from officers for premature voluntary retirement and a further expansion of both the Territorial Army and the Home Service Force.

The Army enters 1987 materially better equipped than it has ever been and in good shape. This is due first to the fact that the present Government have met in full every one of the eight reports on service pay that we have received from the Armed Forces Pay Review Body, with phasing for just a matter of months in only two of those eight years. That is a very much better record than that of our predecessors.

The Army's good shape today is also due to the very substantial increase in expenditure on the Army over the last eight years, compared with the level in 1978-79. Indeed, the total additional expenditure on the Army in real terms by the present Government compared with the 1978-79 level will, by the end of this financial year, be more than £2,000 million, excluding additional Falklands costs. That figure shows that the criticisms of the Opposition about insufficient conventional defence expenditure are patently unjustified.

That complaint is even less warranted from a party whose party conference less than six months ago gave the following commitment:

"Over time the policy will enable us to achieve our long term goal of bringing Britain's defence spending as a proportion of national income towards the average of our major European allies."

That would represent cutting Britain's defence expenditure as a proportion of GDP by about one third.

The prime beneficiary of the huge increase in defence expenditure we have achieved for the Army—all of it strengthening our conventional capabilities—has been the 1st British Corps in Germany; and its equipment in particular. Among the major items of Army equipment ordered by the present Government—not by our predecessors—and now already in service with the 1st British Corps are the Challenger main battle tank, the Saxon armoured personnel carrier, tracked Rapier, the Javelin air defence missile, the new SA80 rifle, new personal combat kit, the Ptarmigan communication system, the Wavell computerised information system, the new night observation and gunnery sight for Chieftain and Challenger, the S10 respirator, and additional Lynx helicopters. That is, of course, not the end of the equipment transformation that we have been achieving for the Army.

In the next few years the Army will be receiving a number of further major items of equipment already ordered by the present Government including the multiple launch rocket system, Warrior, Rapier 2000 and the Starstreak air defence missile. What has been, and is continuing to take place, is the comprehensive modernisation of the Army's equipment—its armour and anti-armour capabilities giving BAOR 12 armoured regiments by the end of the decade compared with eight in 1980, its artillery, its air defence, its armoured mobility, its infantry weapons, its communications equipment and its logistic support. That could have been achieved only by the greater priority given to defence by the present Government compared with our predecessors.

The modernisation of the Army's equipment is very necessary. Last year Mr. Gorbachev called for reductions in conventional forces, both in men and equipment, from the Atlantic to the Urals. That was a welcome call, and we hope that 1987 will see a constructive response to the West's new MBFR proposals which were tabled in December 1985 and on which we are still awaiting a substantive response.

Notwithstanding the calls for reductions, however, the reality on the other side of the inner German border is that the strengthening of Soviet forces in eastern Europe continues—and continues relentlessly. The past year has seen a further significant improvement in Soviet armour. Soviet tank production in recent years is estimated to have averaged over 3,000 new tanks a year—double that of NATO.

The T64B and T80 tanks are replacing the older models. Many of these new tanks are fitted with explosive reactive armour to try to neutralise NATO anti-tank guided missiles; all can fire a guided missile through the gun barrel—a capability not possessed by current western battle tanks. Their already formidable attack helicopter capability is being strengthened still further as the older Hind helicopters are replaced by newer, better armed and equipped models. Their conventional artillery is being improved by the addition of more sophisticated munitions and new self-propelled guns. Current models of ground and air-launched anti-armour guided missiles are being replaced by models with improved guidance and a higher kill probability.

In chemical weapons the Warsaw pact's forces in Europe currently have a near monopoly. In nuclear weapons, the advantage that the Warsaw pact's ground forces have in ballistic missiles up to 300 km in range is 8:1. These figures are disturbing enough but they do not include nuclear capable artillery where Soviet superiority continues to increase as their single role conventional artillery is replaced by dual-capable artillery that can fire either conventional or nuclear shells.

Some see the answer to the massive Soviet superiority in shorter-range nuclear weapons to be a nuclear-free zone. I note that the Liberal and SDP defence policy statement issued on 16 December says, and I quote:

"We would seek a battlefield-nuclear weapon-free zone in Central Europe extending 150 km in each direction from the East/West divide. This would reduce reliance on short-range nuclear weapons and therefore the danger of their being used by either side."

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Has my right hon. Friend noticed that no representative of the SDP or Liberal party is in the Chamber? Is that not absolutely——

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): Would the hon. Gentleman like to withdraw those remarks?

Mr. Jessel: I withdraw what I said. I am sorry, I did not notice the hon. Gentleman, who is an Alliance Member.

Mr. Stanley: We welcome the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) to the debate and congratulate him on winning in the hotly contested competition to be the single alliance spokesman on defence.

I was referring to the alliance's policy. I must say that that policy statement must have been written by what I can describe only as the "happy illusion" brigade on the alliance Benches. Judging by what alliance Members say, that brigade is a well-manned unit. After all, the idea that a 150 km nuclear-free zone would reduce reliance on short-range nuclear weapons is, I fear, pure wishful thinking. Those short-range systems are all mobile. They can be moved back into a paper nuclear-free zone in no time at all. Even without moving any of their shortest-range weapons the Soviets could still target any point of the nuclear-free zone with other non-strategic nuclear weapons—with their SCUDs with a range of 300 km, their SS23s with a range of 500 km, their Scaleboard missiles with a range of 900 km or their SS20s with a range of 5,000 km.

The nuclear-free zone policy of the Liberal and Social Democratic parties on the central front has the same illusory quality as the nuclear-free zone policy of the London borough of Lambeth. Although the nuclear-free zone policy of those two parties would be of no value to the British Army's deployment on the central front, the non-nuclear policy of the official Opposition would be positively and hugely damaging.

A non-nuclear Britain means a non-nuclear 1st British Corps in Germany, and the House and country will want to be very clear about the implications of that. It would mean having eight NATO Army corps deployed down the inner German border with seven of those Army corps being nuclear-capable and one not. That would blow a gaping hole straight through NATO's entire deterrent posture which rests on combining conventional and nuclear defence. That is why for the Labour party to say in one breath that it supports NATO and in another that it will unilaterally scrap all Britain's nuclear defences is a complete contradiction.

To make the 1st British Corps the one and only non-nuclear corps in Germany would relegate the British Army to being NATO's lame duck on the central front. It will make the British Army of the Rhine the number one target for any Soviet offensive. It will make BAOR, not the military asset that it is today, but a military liability.

In defence terms, it is self-evidently non-viable to have seven corps deployed side by side that are nuclear-capable and one in the middle that is not. As far as the British Army is concerned, the non-nuclear policy of the Labour party can lead in one direction, and one direction only—the gradual withdrawal of the British Army from Germany. Far from strengthening NATO's conventional defence posture, the Labour party's non-nuclear defence policy will weaken it disastrously.

I shall now turn from the Army in Germany to the Army in Britain where more than 80,000 men would be available on mobilisation. As the House knows, in Exercise Brave Defender in 1985 we conducted—and conducted successfully—the largest post-war exercise in home defence. A non-classified paper summarising the lessons from this valuable exercise has been placed in the Library. Procedural and organisational improvements in the light of Brave Defender continue to be made.

A critically important component of the Army's order of battle, both at home and on the continent, are the territorial and regular reserves. The strength of the Territorial Army which was about 59,000 in May 1979, has now risen to more than 77,000—an increase of a further 1,000 since last year. The second and major phase of our planned expansion of the TA started last April. This phase involves the formation of six additional infantry battalions, an additional light reconnaissance squadron, two additional airfield damage repair squadrons, the first TA helicopter squadron and some additional support units.

The trial programme for raising TA units on the continent is making good progress. A company and four platoon-size units are now in being. I am also glad to say that last year a group of territorials from the King's Regiment undertook TA training in the Falklands for the first time.

The Home Service Force also continues to expand and now stands at over 3,000—well on target for its planned strength of about 5,000 by 1990. I have referred before to our wish to make better use of our regular reserves who represent a significant pool of trained manpower. At present, some 65,000 have war roles individually allocated to them. Work is now in hand to extend this planning, on a contingency basis, to a further 35,000 of those liable to reserve service. May I once again express our warm appreciation of those who give their valuable time and boundless enthusiasm to make the Army's reserve forces the success that they undoubtedly are.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): The Minister mentioned that the number of men in the Territorial Army has increased from 59,000 to 77,000 since this Government have been in power. A year ago it had 76,000 men and the Minister said in his statement at that time that there had been an increase from the previous year of 4,000. This year there has been an increase in enrolment of only 1,000. Why has enrolment slowed down? Are there any reasons for the drop from 4,000 to 1,000 a year?

Mr. Stanley: I also made it clear in my remarks that we began the second phase of our expansion only in April last year and that inevitably TA recruiting has a cyclical pattern of advertising and publicity. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman greatly welcomes the fact that the TA is now significantly stronger than it was when his party was in government.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. Will he tell the House whether he has any plans or is thinking of having any plans to give further training opportunities to the Regular Army reserve, and also to the possibility of allowing people when leaving the regular forces before they go on the reserve to themselves make a commitment to train with the Regular Army reserve over the next few years?

Mr. Stanley: As my hon. Friend knows, we have been considering ways in which we can make greater use of those who have a reserve commitment. At present we do not have any specific formal arrangements of the sort to which he has referred, but I shall gladly consider that matter further and write to him if I have anything further to add. However, there are some informal arrangements that some individuals make.

I shall now turn to the Army's role outside the NATO area. The Labour policy statement approved at its last party conference states—[Interruption.] Britain will face some important defence issues and, although much attention has been devoted to the Labour party's commitment to non-nuclear policy, there are other important aspects of the defence policy which we shall bring to the attention of the House and of the country.

The Labour party's policy statement which has been approved states:

"Labour will conduct an immediate review aimed at reducing and then ending out-of-area spending."

The folly of that commitment may be demonstrated simply. Since the end of the second world war the British Army has been involved in 71 operational deployments outside the United Kingdom. Of those 71 deployments, 67 have been outside the NATO area.

It is, I fear, par for the course for the Labour party to commit itself to end defence spending in those parts of the world where 40 years' experience suggests that our armed forces are most likely to be needed.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): On that point, would it not be constructive to consider the position in relation to Belize, which is the only primary jungle training centre that we now have? Allowing for the politics of that country, is it not true that if we withdrew our forces from Belize the on-cost—the amount of money that we would gain as a result,—is not much, since we would still have to pay the soldiers when we brought them back home, find them a base, and have to use and train them? Therefore, to that extent, the Labour party's suggestion on this, as on so many other defence issues, is completely nutty.

Mr. Stanley: My hon. Friend's latter point is entirely valid. If it were necessary to relocate back into the United Kingdom units which are at present deployed overseas there would be significant relocation and fixed costs in providing accommodation for the men and their families. My hon. Friend is also right to highlight the training aspect of that policy. I would stress that with the inevitable unpredictability of the world, the historic pattern and the whole of the post-war experience, it is likely that greater need for British armed services in operation will take place outside the NATO area.

The Falklands conflict itself showed the importance of maintaining and improving our ability to take action outside the NATO area. In November we were able to carry out the first major exercise demonstrating this capability in Exercise Saif Sareea in the Oman, deploying our new joint force headquarters with elements of both 5 Airborne Brigade and 3 Commando Brigade, along with RAF Tornados and transport aircraft.

The exercise successfully demonstrated our capability to mount an out-of-area deployment rapidly by air and provided an excellent opportunity to practise tri-service operations with a host country. We are making a very detailed study of the lessons to be learnt from Saif Sareea and will look for further opportunities in the future to exercise our out-of-area capability.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Before the Minister leaves our out-of-area capability, The Independent has reported twice, most recently this morning under the by-line of Frances Wheen, that talks are taking place in Washington with Argentina on the future of the Falklands. Are those talks taking place? Is Mr. Wheen right or wrong?

Mr. Stanley: That is an interesting question and one for my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, as the talks do not involve the British Army.

Another important aspect of our out-of-area defence commitments is the military assistance that we give overseas. Last year we had more than 650 service men, of which the Army's component was 450, serving in that role in 28 countries — all outside the NATO area. These service men and, now a few service women as well, do an extremely valuable job for Britain, often in testing conditions. They provide high quality training for our friends around the world, and support our important defence sales efforts overseas. I note that the Labour party has acknowledged that its policies will lead to a major reduction in our defence sales, which last year were worth approximately £5 billion, and I am sure that this commitment will also be well noted by the many thousands of people in all parts of Britain whose jobs are dependent on defence exports.

A further contribution that the Army has made outside the NATO area is in disaster relief. In 1986 the Queen's Gurkha Engineers and Royal Signalers assisted the Solomon Islands in the wake of cyclone Namu. Medical, engineer and signalling assistance from Belize was given to Jamaica following severe flooding there last June, and members of the Parachute Regiment also gave help. In October, the Belize garrison provided similar assistance to San Salvador following the earthquake there.

Of the Army's service men deployed outside the NATO area I should particularly like to refer to two groups. The first are those who served in successive training teams in Uganda between March 1984, when Britain took over the training task previously undertaken there by a mixed training team drawn from seven Commonwealth countries, and November of last year, when our training team completed its scheduled task for the Government of President Museveni. A total of 140 service men, all from the Army, have served in Uganda over the past four and a half years, during what, sadly, has been a turbulent period for that country. Our training team there has worked steadily, calmly and professionally. Despite the difficulties and the moments of personal danger, it has performed extremely creditably.

The second group are the members of the Royal Military Police. For many years they have played a key role in giving personal protection to those at risk from terrorist attack, not least in Northern Ireland. In recent years as the terrorist threat has widened and become more acute for some of our diplomatic personnel, two of whom have been assassinated in the past three years, the role of the Royal Military Police has been extended to the protection of certain ambassadors and high commissioners in high-risk locations, where they are providing an invaluable service.

I can tell the House that the presence of the Royal Military Police has helped considerably in protecting our diplomats in both Beirut and Uganda. The contribution of the Royal Military Police in personal protection has never been in greater demand and we are extremely grateful for the expertise it provides.

[Mr. Stanley]

Operationally much the most important and demanding task for the Army in 1986 was the support of the Royal Ulster Constabulary in Northern Ireland. As I said earlier, 1986 saw the security forces in Northern Ireland having to meet their most serious challenge for a number of years. The security forces have risen to that challenge, and, with the aid of the RUC, have met it successfully. But it has meant that at the end of 1986 the Army in Northern Ireland was larger than at the beginning of the year. This is the first year in which this has happened since 1972, but we hope to reverse the trend again this year.

The fact that we were ready to increase the scale of the Army's deployment to Northern Ireland, and to do so quickly, is the clearest possible evidence of the Government's determination to root out terrorism and to overcome intimidation in the Province.

The greater challenge to the security forces last year arose from a combination of factors. These included the intensive use of home-made mortars to bomb security force bases, and the ruthless intimidation, including cold-blooded murder, of building contractors and others serving the security forces. I am glad to say, however, that the position was more encouraging by the end of 1986 than at the beginning.

The tactic of intimidating building contractors has been met successfully. Using both private contractors and the Royal Engineers, ably supported by the Royal Pioneer Corps, the past year has seen a major programme of rebuilding and strengthening our bases.

I should like to pay tribute to the Royal Engineers who this year celebrate the 200th anniversary of the granting of their royal charter. In the wars and campaigns since 1787 the sappers have constantly demonstrated their indispensability.

The Royal Engineers have been serving in Northern Ireland continually since the start of the present troubles in 1969, but if any year there deserved to be called the "Year of the Sappers" it was 1986. The first engineer reinforcement squadron was deployed to the Province in October 1985. The sappers set to work with a will, and never let up. By the end of last year they had completely rebuilt two police stations; increased protection at 30 other police stations and Army bases; and erected new observation posts in south Armagh and improved existing ones. In addition, the Royal Engineers themselves designed new forms of blast walls, a new design of protected accommodation for police stations, and a new type of roof to overcome the effect of a mortar bomb.

In the past year there is no doubt that lives have been saved and injuries prevented as a direct result of the additional protection provided by the Royal Engineers. I know that the whole House will want to join with me in expressing our appreciation to the Royal Engineers for their life-saving work in Northern Ireland last year and in congratulating them on their 200th anniversary. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]

As for positive successes in 1986, the security forces killed four individuals engaged in terrorist activities, and 630 people had been charged with terrorist offences up to the end of November. A total of 215 weapons were found, together with more than 5,000 lb of explosives and 29,000 rounds of ammunition.

Although this is a debate on the Army, I should particularly like to pay tribute to the immense and selfless contribution of the Royal Ulster Constabulary in the past year as it is fundamental to the Army's own efforts.

The RUC is in the front line in Northern Ireland in every sense. The lead responsibility for security is the RUC's; the Army is in a support role to the police, but they work together in the most closely integrated and co-ordinated way at all levels.

Once again, the RUC was the prime terrorist target and, for the second year running, suffered a greater number of men killed than either the Regular Army or the UDR. In addition, RUC officers and their families had to face deplorable physical harrassment, including petrol bombing of their homes from so-called loyalist extremists.

Notwithstanding those intense pressures, the RUC achieved policing of an exceptionally high standard, not merely in the calm, ordered and even-handed way in which it dealt with large-scale marches and demonstrations, but in the great skill and professionalism which it has shown in countering terrorist operations. The House will want to know that the great majority of the finds of terrorist weapons and explosives and of the terrorist arrests I mentioned were due to excellent police work by the RUC for whom praise cannot be too high.

Just as exposed to terrorist attack as the RUC are the men and women of the Ulster Defence Regiment, which is responsible for first line military support to the police in the 85 per cent. of the land area of the Province which contains about 80 per cent. of the population. Like the RUC, the men and women of the Ulster Defence Regiment are vulnerable to terrorist assassination off-duty as well as on, and after they have retired from the regiment as well as while they are serving. Last year the UDR suffered more men killed than the Regular Army in Northern Ireland, as has been the case for six out of the past 10 years. The grim reality of their off-duty vulnerability is brought out by the fact that of the 92 UDR soldiers who have lost their lives in the past 10 years, 74 have been murdered off duty. In addition, 31 men have been murdered who had already retired from service with the regiment. That the regiment has some 6,500 men and women serving with it today is a tremendous personal tribute to those concerned.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Before my right hon. Friend leaves the subject of the Ulster Defence Regiment, I should like to ask him whether it might be possible for some of those politicians — perhaps also those south of the border who are ill-disposed towards the UDR, in spite of all that it does at great cost for the defence of the people—to be persuaded to pay a visit to the UDR to meet some of the battalions, to see what they are like and what they do, because that is of great importance. I do not agree with the Anglo-Irish agreement, but it is implicit in that agreement that there should be an understanding of the security arrangements on both sides of the border. Could some arrangement be made to educate some of those politicians as to what the Ulster Defence Regiment is really like?

Mr. Stanley: My hon. Friend will be glad to know that we have been engaged in that process. Last year we issued invitations to the political parties in the Province for briefings on the role of the UDR so that the precise nature of its work could be properly and dispassionately explained to them and so that we had the opportunity of responding to their questions. Some responded to those invitations, but others did not. I entirely accept my hon. Friend's point, and we wish to get across the real nature of the work done by that important regiment.

Finally, turning to the Regular Army in Northern Ireland, we have maintained two additional battalions on four-month unaccompanied tours for the greater part of last year. That meant a total of eight infantry battalions having to make short-notice, unexpected, deployments to Northern Ireland in 1986. Despite the regimental and personal family disruption that caused, the battalions involved responded extremely well and quickly became effective on the ground. It is the infantry which is in the front line of the campaign, as is borne out by the fact that a total of 18 infantry battalions served in the Province during 1986.

The Army has been highly effective in the Province during 1986 with its intensive patrolling and its continually improving surveillance. There have been a number of conspicuous specific successes. The bomb disposal teams, who again cannot be praised too highly, have rendered safe some 82 separate devices containing over 9,000 lb of explosive. Quick action by a lance-corporal on his own initiative led to the find of three loaded weapons and the arrest of three men. A vigorous follow up by a Royal Marine patrol of a terrorist shoot in Belfast in September led to a terrorist being killed. Similarly swift action by a patrol in identifying and reacting to a shooting attack in Londonderry in February led to one terrorist being killed and one man being arrested and subsequently charged with attempted murder.

The courage and skill shown by Regular Army and the UDR in Northern Ireland last year is reflected in the 120 decorations for gallantry in Northern Ireland that were awarded. These included three Military medals, two George medals, and one Queen's gallantry medal.

The Army enters 1987 well-recruited and well-occupied. It has a great deal of new equipment that has come into service since 1979 and a great deal more in the pipeline. It performs a huge range of roles from counter-terrorism to disaster relief with unfailingly high professional standards and strong individual commitment.

The British Army is a fine standard-bearer for our country round the world and makes a key contribution to the maintenance of the peace with freedom that we enjoy at home. Our warm appreciation goes to the men and women of the British Army who serve us so very well.

5.36 pm

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): The Minister of State for the Armed Forces quite rightly paid tribute to the skill and professionalism of the Army—indeed, to all the armed forces—in the many roles that it is asked to perform in the United Kingdom, specifcally in Northern Ireland, and outside the United Kingdom in the places that he mentioned, for example, in Germany, the Falkland Islands, Belize and other parts of the world.

I readily pay tribute also, because on my visits to various armed units I have seen the professionalism and skill of the Army. No doubt that applies to other hon. Members. Therefore, I should like to pay my personal tribute to the forces and to say also that one is always struck by their niceness—I know that that is not an elegant word—and by their civility and good humour when one visits them. I am sure that I am speaking for most people who meet our armed forces.

The Minister gave us the same world tour that he gave us last year. However, this time it was a little spiced with a bit of political knockabout and a few selective quotes here and there, no doubt on orders from Smith square because this might well be an election year. I understand why the Minister did that but, of course, he considered the past and talked very little about the future. I am not surprised about that because there is not much stomach these days in the Ministry of Defence for looking very far ahead in terms of the defence budget. One can understand that, because it is quite clear to most independent analysts that if, by some freak, the Tory party wins the next election, we shall pretty rapidly be faced with a major and fundamental defence review. There is little doubt about that, because the defence budget is out of control and the Government are not prepared to try to do anything to rein it back while facing what might be an election year.

Mr. Robert Atkins: What about the Labour party's defence review?

Mr. Davies: When the cuts start, they will fall on the Army as they will, no doubt, fall also upon the Navy and the Air Force. The cuts will fall not only on the Army, but on our contribution to NATO. The Minister mentioned commitment to NATO and, as he knows, 95 per cent. of our defence budget goes to NATO on conventional defence expenditure. When the cuts come, as they will, they will fall on conventional defence expenditure, and that means on our conventional contribution to NATO at a time when, I should have thought, we need to build up NATO's conventional defences and not weaken them. However, in view of the expenditure on Trident, the Government's policy will mean a reduction in the conventional contribution to NATO and, specifically in the case of the British Army, will mean a weakening of our contribution in Germany in respect of the British Army of the Rhine.

Mr. Marlow: On the subject of reducing our contribution in BAOR, if we arrive at the position explained by my right hon. Friend the Minister where 1(BR)Corps is the only fighting formation in Germany that does not have the nuclear umbrella—I think that hon. Gentlemen know what that means—and if, sadly, there is a conflict with the Warsaw pact and it threatens 1(BR)Corps with a nuclear onslaught, will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House what he would say to our NATO allies? Would he say, "On no account do we want you to come to our defence," or would he say, "Yes, do come to our defence."?

Mr. Davies: I shall deal with that later. I was saying that it makes no sense to weaken the conventional arm of NATO within Europe to pay for Trident, which is basically what the Government will do. Conservative Members talk glibly about the nuclear umbrella. I would have thought that the first priority should be to strengthen conventional arms so that we never reach that awful moment when nuclear artillery and nuclear shells are called upon.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead) rose——

Mr. Davies: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman later.

The cuts will come, first because the Government have ended the 3 per cent. NATO commitment initially entered into by the Labour Government. Secondly, the cuts will come because the Government have made a decision not to allow defence expenditure to increase in real terms. Thirdly, within the total of the declining defence expenditure, there is an escalating expenditure for Trident, certainly over the next four or five years. Therefore, the defence budget will be cut and there will be a major defence review if the Tories win the next election. Indeed, that has already started for the Army. I am interested to note that the Minister did not mention the fact that it is apparently reported that this year the Army has had to face £150 million-worth of cuts, and over the next two years it is reported that the Army will have to reduce its expenditure by up to 4 per cent. and that has been calculated to be about £250 million a year. No doubt that money will come from different parts of the armed forces but much of it will come as a result of not buying new equipment and postponing the purchase of the equipmet that is needed for our conventional defence in Europe.

Dr. Glyn: The Minister made it perfectly clear that the money that has been spent was on the modernisation of conventional forces and there is no sign of a reduction.

Mr. Davies: With respect, the Minister talked about the past but he did not say anything about next year. I can understand why he did not want to talk about next year for the reasons I have just given.

The major commitment, despite the problems in Northern Ireland, is the commitment of 55,000 troops in Germany. That is probably the furthest east that a standing British Army has ever been in peacetime for such a long period. That is a major commitment for Britain in view of our history and in view of our expenditure and so on.

Mr. Robert Atkins: What about India?

Mr. Davies: I meant to say furthest east in Europe. I accept that India is further east than Germany. It is a major commitment in terms of money, men and resources.

To enable the British Army to perform its function in Germany and to play its part in NATO, two things are necessary. It needs modern equipment. The Minister has recounted some of the improvements of the past few years. The Army together with our NATO allies needs to know that if war should break out in that part of Europe, the war it will be called upon to fight will be carried out in accordance with a sensible and credible military strategy.

Despite what the Minister said, there are woeful gaps in the equipment needed by the British Army of the Rhine. For instance, the Army is well short of the sort of anti-tank weapons and missiles that are required, especially in respect of the more modern Soviet tanks we have been told about. Artillery is another area of neglect. Perhaps artillery is always neglected in peacetime, I know not. It is certainly not as romantic or dramatic as driving around in tanks or sitting behind a 25-pounder, or whatever the latest type of weapon may be. However, perhaps the Minister could have told us something about the SP70. What is happening about that? Apparently, Britain, Germany and Italy have already spent about £250 million and Britain's share has been £88 million.

To make a speech about the Army and devote a third of it to our defences in Germany against the Warsaw pact, with its preponderance of artillery, and not even mention an expenditure of £88 million and the importance of the SP70 for the Army is ridiculous. Is it true that it is about to be cancelled and that it is only a question of which country will dare to do it first? Is it true that the Government are thinking of buying a piece of American equipment off the shelf? I hope that when the Minister winds up he will tell the House what is happening to the SP70, especially in view of the fact that the position on artillery, as General Farndale said some time ago, is not very good for the British Army of the Rhine.

Mr. Rogers: My right hon. Friend has mentioned the £250 million that has been spent on the SP70. Is it not true that only 15 of the howitzers have been made? That would mean a cost of £17 million per howitzer.

Mr. Davies: That may be the case. We would like to know where the £88 million has gone. I do not think that the SP70 is a particularly complex weapon; perhaps I am wrong. Perhaps we will be told where the money has gone when the Minister replies to the debate.

The Minister talked about Soviet tanks. Apparently there is a new generation of mine which is useful in stopping tanks. However, the Government announced before Christmas that they were not going ahead with the purchase and production of those mines. What is happening about the new generation of mines that could be so effective in stopping those tanks charging across the West German border?

This year we had half a sentence on helicopters. Last year we had a paragraph. Last year the Minister sought to make our flesh creep with an account of the new Soviet helicopters. He said:

"The formidable Hind anti-tank helicopter is still being added to the Warsaw pact front line at a fast rate.

The Warsaw pact's logistic support for its forces will shortly be further improved with the deployment of its new heavy lift helicopter . . . We saw for ourselves in the Falklands what a force multiplier helicopters in the logistic role can be."—[Official Report, 30 January 1986; Vol. 90, c. 1115.]

What are the Government doing about helicopters? Paragraph 68 of the report of the Select Committee on Defence said that a study was being conducted, that the results of the study would be known by the autumn and that the Government would make their decision at the end of 1986 or early this year. What has happened in respect of that study and what decisions will be made?

The British Army has never had a purpose-built anti-tank helicopter and it needs one. As I understand it, we are about 100 helicopters short of our NATO requirement on the central front. There are some unkind people who say that we have the oldest fleet of helicopters in the Western Alliance. Indeed, it may well be that we have fewer than 30 transporter helicopters, Chinooks and Pumas, on the central front. How can the Minister talk about the Army without mentioning artillery, helicopters or mines? They are all crucial defences against the Warsaw pact, especially the tanks, which, as we are continually reminded, it has in large numbers.

As well as equipment, our forces in Germany need to have a military strategy that is credible and sensible. That certainly is not the case any longer in respect of present NATO strategy.

NATO has now reached a point where its strategy of forward defence, the conventional arm of part of the strategy, and the strategy of flexible response, the nuclear part of that strategy, is no longer militarily credible. It owes far more to political considerations and to history than it does to military prudence.

We debate these matters very rarely in the House, but, put simply, NATO strategy is as follows. There is a massive conventional preponderance of arms with the Warsaw pact. The war in Europe will be a short conventional war, because the linear line of defence will be broken fairly quickly and the Germans, as somebody suggested from a sedentary position, do not wish to see any of their territory fought over in a conventional sense. After a few days, the request is made to go nuclear. Apparently, the strategy does not seek to defend territory conventionally, but is quite prepared to destroy that very territory which it is not prepared to defend conventionally by dropping nuclear shells and possibly nuclear bombs on that battlefield.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): We are following the right hon. Gentleman's arguments, and we want to treat him seriously, as we trust he wants to treat the House. I am an assiduous attender of the North Atlantic Assembly; I chaired the military unit. I have never heard such a travesty. No one talks about dropping huge bombs on the battlefield after a few days because we are fed up fighting a conventional war, thus blowing ourselves up in the process.

Mr. Davies: The strategy is perfectly clear. It is—the Minister of State for the Armed Forces implied this, because this was his criticism of us—that if deterrence fails, and nobody has ever suggested that deterrence will never fail, or can never fail, war will become a battlefield nuclear war in central Europe. [Interruption.] What are these dual-capable artillery guns that the Minister was talking about for? What are all these nuclear weapons for, which in the main, the Americans have? They are there to be used; they are there to be dropped. They are there to be used should deterrence fail and a conventional war is being lost. In this case, "lost" means if German territory has to be given up. That is NATO strategy, and I am sorry that hon. Members either do not want to know or think about these things or prefer not to talk about them.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Davies: I shall not give way; other people wish to speak. The hon. Gentleman can make his own speech when the time comes.

Since most nuclear artillery in particular has a short range, it will, by definition, be used on NATO territory.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: No.

Mr. Davies: Because of the short range of much of this artillery, and because the battle will be fought on NATO territory—nobody is suggesting that we are attacking the other side, and we are postulating the situation where a conventional war becomes nuclear—much of that artillery will be dropped on the NATO battlefield between the River Elbe on the one side and the River Weser on the other. Hon. Members should accept that, and they should not shut their eyes to it, because that is the reality of the position. [Interruption.] That artillery will be dropped on NATO territory because of its range and because it is there to destroy Russian tanks. I am sure that the Minister will tell hon. Members exactly what the range of those weapons is. It will fall on NATO territory to destroy Soviet formations, and that will inevitably destroy NATO forces, German towns and German civilian population. That has been, and is, the objection voiced by Chancellor Schmidt, Robert McNamara, Henry Kissinger and others. That has always been the objection to this crazy strategy of flexible response and forward defence.

Will the Minister tell us—he talked about the problems of not using these shells—who decides when this nuclear artillery will be used? Will it be after two or three days? With the difficulty of communication, field commanders may have to make a request within two or three days of that war breaking out. It may be seven or eight days. Who will decide? It will not be a military decision, but a political decision. Who will decide? Will it be the British Prime Minister, the German Chancellor, the Dutch or the Belgians? Who will decide to start a nuclear war in central Europe in the middle of a conventional war? The House is not told about these things. Nobody wants to know about or to listen to these things, but we should be told what the chain of decision is in the event of deterrence failing and the scenario, which NATO seems to believe could happen, actually happening.

Mr. Robert Atkins: While the right hon. Gentleman is on the subject of shells, will he consider the possibility, indeed the probability, of the Warsaw pact using its current chemical-capability shells—1 in 4? How would we respond to that? What would his reaction be if it started tossing those things at NATO? Would he forget about them, ignore them or try to respond in some way?

Mr. Davies: I do not wish to discuss chemical weapons. We do not disagree with the Government on chemical weapons. The Government have no intention of equipping the British forces in Germany with chemical weapons. I know that there is a lobby for chemical rearmament of the British Army. The hon. Gentleman has asked that question on numerous occasions. When he cannot think of anything else to say he is up on his feet talking about chemical weapons. It is an important subject.

The question of flexible response relates wholly to nuclear weapons. Presumably, since most of these nuclear warheads are American-made and owned, the decision will be taken by the President of the United States. There may be consultation with the German Chancellor and the British Prime Minister because of the involvement of the various forces with the weaponry, but the reality would be that an American President—perhaps the Minister will tell us when he replies—would decide.

What would he be asked? He would be asked, and he would have to decide, to unleash a first use, or a first strike, of nuclear weaponry, not from American territory to Russian territory, but on European soil in Germany, where there are hundreds of thousands of American troops and civilians as well as other NATO forces, and a large number of German citizens and towns.

We all have our opinions about these things. I do not believe that an American President, in view of the enormity of the moral and military consequences, would agree to unleash those weapons in Europe, thereby breaking the nuclear threshold and inviting a retaliatory nuclear attack from the Warsaw pact. Such a war would probably escalate into a general nuclear conflagration. I do not believe that it would happen.

The United States Defence Secretary, Caspar Weinberger—if I may mention his name from the

[Mr. Davies]

Labour Benches—in a speech in the United States on 9 October 1985 completely rejected the strategy which is called flexible response. He sometimes talks sense and on that occasion he said:

"Our position"—

no doubt, the position of the United States—

"on the uses of military power represents a rejection of received wisdom about limited war and gradual escalation."

If that is not a statement that he does not believe in flexible response either, I do not know what is, because the limited war is the limited battlefield war in central Europe, and the gradual escalation is the escalation from the so-called smaller weapons—the shells—on upwards, presumably, to the cruise and Pershing missiles. The truth is—the Conservative party realises this—that the strategy is completely incredible and out of date.

Mr. Stanley: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. I can certainly assure him that the American Defence Secretary is committed to the doctrine of flexible response. I have been following the thrust of the right hon. Gentleman's arguments closely and I should be grateful if he could tell the House whether, if his policies were implemented and the 1st British Corps on the central front had no nuclear capability, the use of the formidable Soviet short-range nuclear capability against British forces on the central front would be more or less likely.

Mr. Davies: The right hon. Gentleman talks about the nuclear capability of the 1st British Corps. That nuclear capability in respect of artillery will only be there when a decision has been taken to release the shells which can then be used. The right hon. Gentleman talks as if that is a military decision; that the military capability is there, the commander puts the bomb in the howitzer and that is it. The right hon. Gentleman talks about the nuclear capability of the first British Corps, but who makes that decision? It is not a military but a political decision and every Government will preserve the right to decide whether to take that decision. The right hon. Gentleman does not know whether a British Prime Minister or an American President would allow the 1st British Corps to have that nuclear capability, as he calls it. Before it can have it, there must be a political decision to release the actual warheads.

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): I have been following the right hon. Gentleman's point with some care. If I understand him correctly, he is drawing a scenario in which the might of the Warsaw pact has been unleashed against NATO, and he questions, as everyone of us must have questioned, whether NATO will remain united and be prepared to use its weaponry against such an attack. If he questions that, how does he condone his party's policy of saying that it still supports NATO? He cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Davies: I am not questioning whether NATO will remain united. Surely the hon. Gentleman, as a former Defence Minister, will understand that I am making the point that the decision to use this so-called nuclear capability would be a political, not a military, decision, taken by the Governments of the time and, in the main, taken by the President of the United States. I do not believe that the President would do so, but that is a matter of belief.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North) rose—

Mr. Marlow: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: No, I shall give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Cook: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. When considering the point made by the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin), perhaps my right hon. Friend would like to ponder the fact that, when references are made to the massive strength of the Warsaw pact and the great threat that it poses, the frontier posts on the northern boundaries of Norway—which, as my right hon. Friend will know, is a member of NATO—which guard against Soviet ingression receive their electricity supplies from Soviet power stations. What kind of threat would that be?

Mr. Davies: I shall not go into the threat within Norway. Perhaps we can discuss that in another debate. [Interruption.] Perhaps a naval debate would be more appropriate to discuss the threat in that part of Europe.

I was saying that the strategy is out of date. I am sure that Conservative Members often read their copies of the NATO treaty. Although article 2 of that treaty does not mention nuclear weapons, it is apparently considered to be the United States' commitment to the nuclear umbrella—if one wishes to use that cliché or shorthand. Article 2 was drafted when the United States had a nuclear monopoly. The Soviet Union had no nuclear weapons when article 2 was drafted, so it was perfectly easy to give that commitment. Then we moved from the monopoly of the United States to nuclear superiority and something had to be done about the original tripwire strategy. Of course, the something became the formulation of flexible response. That was still all right at that time because the United States still had quite massive superiority, as it did at the time of the Cuba crisis. But now superiority has become, at the least, parity in almost every area of nuclear weaponry. For that reason, the strategy must change and I have no doubt that eventually it will because it makes no sense.

Again, let me quote Caspar Weinberger in the same speech from which I quoted earlier, when he made that very point:

"The world has changed so profoundly"— listening to the Minister, one would not think so—

"since the 1950s and 1960s when most of our strategic ideas were formulated that many of these concepts are now obsolete."

That is the Defence Secretary of the United States commenting on the NATO strategy of flexible response.

We believe that the only sensible defence, and, of course, deterrence, is and would be a conventional one in central Europe. [Interruption.] The moment that one mentions conventional defence we have this hysteria from the Conservative party. We are told about the massive Russian conventional superiority. The Prime Minister implied—perhaps said, although I do not have the quotation—that it was impossible to bridge the gap in conventional weapons. I see some hon. Members nodding sagely. Therefore we would always have to have nuclear weaponry. That is not the view of the United States, but that is the level of the debate that we have in Britain on such matters.

If the Russians have such massive conventional superiority, if they have so many more battalions, the war cannot be won even with battlefield nuclear weapons. Presumably, if we drop ours, they will do the same, and at the end of the day the bigger battalions will win.

Let us look again at conventional Soviet superiority. It cannot be denied that in some areas there is a gap while in others there is not. I do not believe, and most independent experts do not believe, that that gap is unbridgeable. It can be bridged, given the political will, with some increase—not a great increase—in financial resources and if there is a movement away from the simple linear forward defence to a defence in greater layers in that part of Germany which would be affected. One thing is certain——

Mr. Marlow: A sort of Maginot line.

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman intervenes again.

One thing is certain. The Russians certainly are not in a position to fight a conventional war of attrition in that part of Europe. For a start, the Western Alliance—the United States, Canada and the European countries—have twice the population of the Warsaw pact. Economic capacity and economic strength are difficult matters to work out. There is certainly a 4:1 or 5:1 advantage in economic and industrial power. The Soviet Union will be faced not only by Germany, as it was in the last war, but by most of Germany this time, plus, of course, the United States, all the other countries in NATO, and the Chinese who are perched on its border.

Frankly, the idea that the Russians would be capable of fighting a war of attrition against the West, is ridiculous. It would be hard for them to sustain a standing start blitzkreig, despite the fact that they have 4·8 million men in uniform. In fact, about one third of those men are not militarily capable of fighting because they are engaged in other duties. Having accepted that, it still would be virtually impossible for them to sustain the kind of blitzkreig attack that is mentioned from time to time.

On current deployment, the Soviet Union units probably could mount a surprise attack only in East Germany and Czechoslovakia. If it sought to use and move its units in the Ukraine and western military districts, it is doubtful whether it would be able to conduct a surprise attack that would guarantee it some advantage or victory.

I repeat that we accept entirely that there is some gap, especially in ground forces in central Europe, equipment and, indeed, the way in which they are deployed. That gap can be closed by providing more equipment in certain areas, but it is necessary to consider the concept of forward defence because it needs to be restructured.

Despite some modifications — I think that the Minister of State for the Armed Forces announced some modification last year—forward defence is still a linear defence, not a static defence. It is a linear defence with tanks. That is what is wrong with it. There are mechanised troops — troops in tanks, best suited for operational manoeuvre and manoeuvre in depth. They are pinned down in a linear forward defence. Frankly, nobody believes—the Germans will not believe this—that that type of linear forward defence can possibly hold. It is bound to break under a mass attack of tanks from the other side, not because we are weak but because the strategy of using tanks for that purpose does not make much military sense.

Many military experts have been mentioned. There are military experts in Germany and Britain. People such as General Sir Hugh Beach, General Sir Edward Burgess and Brigadier Richard Simkins, who wrote an interesting book on this subject, have argued that forward defence should gradually give way to a more layered defence in part of Germany, thereby making it unnecessary to go through the nonsense of pretending that, somehow, we can use nuclear weaponry in the defence of western Europe.

I must not mention ditches. That would be a terrible subject to mention. In fact, as the House well knows, it was an American idea to have tank traps or ditches, but there are physical and electronic barriers and land mines, which the Government do not want the British Army to have. Physical and electronic barriers could be used as a first layer. It is perfectly possible to have, as a second layer, lightly armed infantry and then, as a third layer of manoeuvrability, tanks. [Interruption.] Hon. Members can make their own speeches. I have discovered that the Tory party does not take defence seriously. It trots out the handouts it gets and does not attempt to think through strategy or any other problems. With that kind of gradual change—the change will be gradual—in the concept of forward defence, it will be possible to have a much greater defence in depth in Germany and we would not have to resort to the nonsense of thinking we can use nuclear weapons.

It is depressing that we do not debate these matters very often in the House. In this possible election year, it is almost impossible to debate these matters as Tory Members trot out their clichés and their handouts from Smith square. As long as we have these attitudes, as long as there is no attempt to discuss strategy, as long as there are cuts because of Trident and the declining defence budget, and unless someting is done, over the next few years, the British Army will be faced with equipment that is not up to standard and, whatever happens, will be faced with a strategy that makes no military sense.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): It was interesting to listen to the speech of the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). He should discuss the latter part of his speech with some of his colleagues, particularly the right hon. Member for Dudley, East (Dr. Gilbert), who wrote an interesting article in the Sunday Telegraph in October. He dealt with the point which the right hon. Gentleman adumbrated in the last few moments of his speech. In his article, the right hon. Member for Dudley, East wrote:

> "The idea that you can keep up our conventional forces by a few tanks and a couple of frigates and that this would compensate NATO commanders for the loss of their nuclear facilities is misleading to the point of mendacity."

I should not have put it as strongly as that but perhaps it would be wrong to put it more mildly. The right hon. Member for Llanelli might care to deal with the point raised by the right hon. Member for Dudley, East who delivered such a severe indictment.

I welcome the fact that we continue to have single service debates. The matters of grand strategy with which the right hon. Member for Llanelli dealt—frankly, I do not think that his strategy was grand — were less appropriate for a debate on the Army than for our broad debates on the White Paper. Single service debates enable us to home in on matters of more detail in relation to the armed forces. Some hon. Members had considerable doubts about the organisation of the Ministry of Defence and, particularly, the abolition of single service Ministers. One of the assurances that we received at the time of the reorganisation was that single service debates would continue, so that we could home in on matters relating specifically to the individual forces and, as a general rule, save broad strategic considerations of defence for the general debate on the White Paper.

It is my privilege to represent a garrison constituency. I represent Colchester, North, and my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary represents the other part of that garrison town. We work harmoniously together and, I am glad to say, with the garrison. The eastern district headquarters are in Colchester. We have an admirable relationship with Major-General Ramsay, the GoC. He goes to considerable lengths to keep in touch with the local such as my right hon. Friend and myself. We have an extremely amicable relationship.

The headquarters of 19 Infantry Brigade, or 19 Air Portable Brigade—perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will tell me exactly what it is called—currently are in Colchester. Other units of considerable importance are situated there also. The military corrective training centre, which is nearing its 50th anniversary—it may be even older — is at long last in the concluding stages of rebuilding. For years the centre has occupied wasteful and uncomfortable nissen huts, but the rebuilding is coming to fruition. It is very much hoped that some senior personage —perhaps a member of the royal family—will open the new MCTC.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): Prince Edward.

Sir Antony Buck: I shall not respond to my hon. Friend's intervention from a sedentary position.

Admirable work is done at the MCTC. It has certain advantages over similar civilian institutions. All the soldiers under sentence are young and fit and can be kept busy in a way that is not possible in a civilian prison. I pay tribute to the work done over the years by the MCTC. Because of pressure from both sides of the House over a long period, the centre will at last move from its old clapped-out nissen huts to new premises. Everyone, especially the staff, in Colchester is grateful for that.

The 19 Air Portable Brigade is part of the strategic reserve and an important unit. There are also resident battalions in my constituency which change with some rapidity. It is difficult to keep track of them because often they go on tours to Northern Ireland. At the moment, we have an extremely good relationship with the Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders which are doing a term of duty in the Falkland Islands. I think that all hon. Members will wish them well in their work.

It is appropriate for me, as chairman of the Conservative party's defence committee, to pay tribute to the work of our armed forces in the Falklands. I had the privilege of leading the first parliamentary delegation to the Falklands after the confrontation and after we had dispatched the Argentines. I had the pleasure of the company of several Opposition Members. The journey was an extraordinary experience. One can look at a map to see the fantastic distances that must be covered to send an expeditionary force to the other side of the world, but there is nothing like covering the route oneself.

There was a relatively comfortable journey to Ascension Island in a DC10. The flight was dry but, other than that, it was like an ordinary civilian aeroplane. One travelled from Ascension Island in a semi-pressurised Hercules — an extraordinary experience. For 16 hours one pounded over the ocean. Two in-flight refuellings were carried out with remarkable expertise by the Royal Air Force. I went up to the co-pilot's seat for the second in-flight refuelling by a former V bomber and saw the difficulties encountered. The maximum speed of a Hercules is about equal to the stalling speed of a former V bomber, so in-flight refuelling occurs from a low dive from 28,000 or 29,000 ft to about 6,000 ft. The RAF carried out the refuelling in a relaxed and amazingly skilful way. The Hercules was packed with army equipment and personnel.

Our armed forces can be very proud of their work in the Falklands. Operations in the Falklands are tri-service, as they were during the war. Inevitably and rightly, the Army plays a major part, although all the services share the credit for maintaining our position in the Falklands. We are grateful to the armed forces for the way in which they are sustaining themselves and our presence there.

We are all grateful to the Army for its clearing of the minefields. Laying those minefields was one of the most irresponsible actions of the Argentines. Many of the mines are plastic, which are virtually undetectable by conventional mine-detecting devices. I saw men prodding inch by inch with bayonets to get the mines out of the ground. I believe that that hazardous exercise has finished, although some parts of the Falklands have been cordoned off with barbed wire. That land probably will never be utilised because of the virtually indestructible plastic mines used by the Argentines. I believe that the presence of the Army in the Falklands will prevent any foolhardy successor to Galtieri from embarking on a similar venture.

It seems to me, because I remain in pretty close touch with the Army in and near my constituency, that Members on both sides of the House should be proud of the calibre of our armed forces. One could almost say that too high a proportion of our talented young people go into the armed forces, but it would be inappropriate for me as chairman of the Conservative party's defence committee seriously to put forward such a view. One never ceases to be amazed at the extraordinarily high calibre of the young men whom one meets in the messes of the Army and the other services. We are fortunate that we have in our country people who are prepared to sustain the armed forces. We can be confident that the quality and calibre of today's Army fully lives up to the calibre of those who served in the past.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): I should like to follow the hon. and learned Member for Colchester, North (Sir A. Buck) in paying tribute to the Army's performance, skill and dedication. Like him, I represent a traditional Army town. I have lived there for 25 years. One cannot live for so long in a town such as Woolwich without being well aware of how much we owe to the professionalism and commitment of our soldiers.

Woolwich has provided essential support services to the Army for generations. I hope that the House will therefore understand if I begin with some domestic issues which affect the community in Woolwich. In my 12 years as a Member of Parliament representing Woolwich I have had to fight a constant rearguard action against nationalisation, closure, privatisation, contractorisation and wholesale relocation of Army support units in Woolwich which have traditionally provided an important source of employment for my constituents.

Two issues are, once again, causing major concern, both of them long-running sagas. One involves the Army cataloguing authority. Several years ago, it was proposed that it should be removed to Glasgow. There was a long argument about the proposal which made no sense in operational terms, and we ended up with a clear categorical assurance from the then Minister that there would be no removal to Glasgow. Therefore, we were surprised to find last year that the future of the Army cataloguing authority was once again in doubt and that the co-location of this unit with another unit certainly did not rule out its removal to Glasgow after all. Since then, there has been an ominous quiet about this proposal and there is anxiety among the staff. It would be helpful if the Minister could tell us something about that proposal.

Rather more serious is the matter of the future of the headquarters of the director of quality assurance. Those headquarters have been at Woolwich arsenal for many years and several years ago we were assured that they would be permanently located there. A great deal of work has gone into the reorganisation of the Woolwich arsenal site. A new head office building has been on the drawing board for years waiting to go ahead, but then suddenly we were told recently that the new Secretary of State for Defence had decided to examine the possibility of removing that headquarters operation to a site outside south-east England. For many of us, Woolwich without the Woolwich arsenal would be like Blackpool without Blackpool tower.

Apart from our emotional commitment, Woolwich has an unemployment rate of 16 per cent. and to remove a traditional source of employment would cause considerable anxiety. The long delay in making a final decision on these issues must be costly and is certainly causing considerable uncertainty to the staff. Anything firm and clear that the Minister could say would be extremely welcome.

I noted that in his speech the Minister picked out for the alliance share in the statutory attack on both opposition parties the concept of a battlefield nuclear weapon-free zone. As I am sure he knows, that was originally proposed by the Palme commission. Missing in what he said about that concept was that it is not designed to provide some sort of sanctuary from nuclear weapons in a clear, defined area. The concept of the battlefield nuclear weapon-free zone or corridor sought to remove some of the dangers of having battlefield nuclear systems actually deployed on the battlefield. In that situation they are vulnerable to a conventional attack.

That gives rise to the classic problem that commanders would have to face at an early stage in a conventional Soviet attack. They would have to decide whether the battlefield nuclear systems should be used or lost because of the risk of their being overrun. We are always assured that there is no risk, that there are adequate safeguards, and that there can be no release of nuclear systems without political consideration and political decisions. I have always found that a somewhat doubtful scenario against the background of a conventional conflict having broken out in central Europe. The idea that 16 nations can solemnly consider the possibility of using battlefield nuclear systems when the conflict is raging around them is somewhat unrealistic.

The difficulty that many of us see about battlefield nuclear weapons is that they reduce the nuclear threshold and change the nature of nuclear weapons from being systems of absolutely last resort to war fighting systems. In that sense, they are the most dangerous nuclear weapons that we have. NATO has substantially reduced its stockpile of shorter range nuclear warheads and the Montebello decision will reduce those stockpiles still further. The idea of a battlefield nuclear weapon-free zone is a logical extension of that approach which would reduce the risks of nuclear conflict in Europe.

The Minister's speech seemed extremely reassuring, not to say complacent, in the picture that he painted of the current state of our armed forces in general and the Army in particular. One did not get any sense of the squeeze on resources which is pointed to by analysts and experts. It was not possible to get the sense of a declining defence budget which is likely to reduce in real terms by about 7 per cent. over the next three years. In terms of equipment and manpower, one did not get a sense of the pressures which that declining budget will inevitably exert.

The problem of recruiting and, more importantly, of retaining the high quality of personnel that we need in the Army certainly did not come through in the Minister's speech. If we want that sort of quality we must pay, clothe, house and feed our service men in a way which keeps them up to the rising living standards of people outside the Army. That implies a rise in real unit costs in service manpower of about 2 to 3 per cent. and that adds to our difficulties about the manpower problem.

The sophistication of weapon systems about which the Minister spoke means that we shall place greater demands on skills and on highly trained and proficient service men. We did not hear from the Minister about the problem of demography, the fact that the numbers of recruitable people in the 17 to 30-year-old age group available to the armed forces will decline sharply from the late 1980s. In 1983, for example, there were almost 2 million 16 to 19-year-olds—1,929,000 to be precise. By 1995, that will drop to 1,351,000. That drop will add to the problems about the costs of recruitment and retention. Some of our European neighbours have the same difficulty and as a result some have increased and extended their conscription systems. That is not a possible option in Britain. Conscription is not a political possibility and the price that has to be paid in terms of the loss of efficiency is not a price that many military people would want to consider.

One of the difficulties coming through is the problem of retaining key staff. When we spend a lot of time, effort and money in training key people, to lose them early is very wasteful. What is called in the trade premature voluntary outflow does not affect only the Army, because, of course, this week it had a distinguished victim in the Royal Marines.

A number of reasons are given for people leaving the services early. Many of the military suggest that the overstretch of our forces is a major factor. They say that there is too much overseas duty, that the Army is being asked to do too much with limited resources and that this has an adverse impact on the lives of officers and men. Some suggest that it is due to the lack of the equipment that is necessary adequately to train people, and some point to the deficiencies of modern equipment.

Last week, an article in one of our national newspapers said that British soldiers are less well protected by their combat clothing than virtually any of the armies of our

[Mr. John Cartwright]

European neighbours. One defence industry source is quoted as saying that every army in western Europe will have flak jackets on general issue before the British Army. There were suggestions that the existing programme in the Ministry of Defence for purchasing flak jackets may have to be reduced because of spending cuts.

Mr. Stanley: Nonsense.

Mr. Cartwright: From a sedentary position the Minister says, "Nonsense." I hope that the Minister who replies to the debate will be able to deal with that point, because clearly that sort of suggestion has an impact on morale and that has an effect on the problem of people leaving early.

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): The hon. Gentleman speaks about equipment for the Army. Now that he holds the position as principal defence spokesman for the alliance will he reconsider the placing of his name to early-day motion 342?

In that motion a company in my constituency called Multilift (UK) Ltd., which has recently obtained an order to supply the DROPS project to the Army, is alleged, together with its parent company Partek of Finland, to have supplied the Soviet Union in general and the Soviet army in particular. Is he aware that Multilift in Shrewsbury has categorically denied that this is the case and has said that its parent company Partek has less than 5 per cent. of its business supplying refuse disposal equipment to the Soviet Union and supplies no military equipment whatever? Before making his allegations, perhaps the hon. Gentleman would check his sources——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member must make an intervention, not a long speech.

Mr. Cartwright: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the information. That early-day motion was tabled before the recess in response to information from a variety of sources and in response to concern on both sides of the House about the DROPS contract and the way in which it was placed. The sort of assurance that the hon. Gentleman has just given will be generally welcomed by all concerned.

Speaking about the outflow of key personnel leads me to remind the House that the Minister told us last July that there had been considerable concern in the Ministry of Defence about this problem and that specific studies were being undertaken into various aspects of early departure from the services. We were told in July that the results of these studies would be available by the year end. We have not yet seen them. Again, it would be useful if the Minister, when replying, would tell us the current position regarding those inquiries and what steps might result to deal with the problem and perhaps reduce it.

I should like to refer to the problem of the defence budget pressures on equipment, because some analysts tell us that the price of major weapons systems is rising at roughly twice the rate of inflation. Examination of past expenditure figures suggests that the cost of general defence procurement is 3 to 5 per cent. above the annual rate of inflation. That again will mean that a reducing defence budget will buy less equipment because of the problem of rising prices. The Government have told us that they hope to tackle the problem by achieving increased efficiency and competition in the supply of goods and services and by extending international collaboration to spread research and development costs and to reduce production costs through longer runs. Both are extremely welcome approaches, and I hope that they succeed. But I doubt very much that they will produce the sort of savings necessary to provide the sort of equipment and levels of manpower that we will need.

One is looking always for major savings in this defence area in order to fund all the improvements that all of us would like to see. It is hard to see where those savings might come, but there is one out-of-area commitment which simply must be re-examined, the commitment to fortress Falklands. The total costs attributable to the Falklands commitment between 1982 and 1994 have been estimated at £4·65 billion at 1983-84 prices. Much of that expenditure is now irrecoverable. It is the essential replacement of war losses that goes into capital investment. But the running costs of the Falklands garrison are now put at £135 million a year, and much of that could be more usefully redirected into the NATO commitment if our fortress Falklands commitment could be reduced or, better still, liquidated. I should like a very much higher priority to be given to diplomatic efforts to find a fairer solution to that problem.

It seems to many of us on both sides of the House that there is no escaping the need for a thorough review of defence priorities. I should like to see that review as part of a European exercise. It is essential that the European members of NATO examine the shape and size of their forces and try to agree on the extent and nature of a more effective division of labour. That would cover the obvious issues of forces currently deployed, the availability of reserves, equipment procurement and research and development. All these things have been discussed regularly over the years, but trying to achieve them is much more important and urgent now than ever before because of the continuing debate and continuing doubt about the extent of the United States manpower commitment to western Europe.

I believe that predictions of a total United States withdrawal are very much exaggerated unless we have a British Government who seek massively to renege on their commitments to NATO, when we might well see a substantial and dramatic change in American policies. But without that we have to face the fact that there will be continuing pressures on the American defence budget and hence growing pressures to reduce the manpower commitment to Europe. In conversations that I have had with him, the supreme allied commander Europe, General Rogers, has given me the clear impression that we would be unwise to assume that the Americans will go on committing 326,000 ground troops to Europe for the foreseeable future. If we are to encourage the United States to maintain and effective commitment to Europe, we have to show that Europe is determined to be doing more to defend itself.

We cannot go on pretending that everything can continue as it is at the moment against a background of a fall in defence expenditure. To do that would be to put greater pressures on our service men than is fair or reasonable. There will obviously be no major defence review this side of the coming general election, but I believe that it must and will come soon after that election, whoever forms the next Government.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): It is a particular pleasure for me to be able on this occasion to follow the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright). It allows me to congratulate him most warmly on his rejoining the Select Committee. He and I were on it when it started in 1980 and his contribution then was very valuable and sensible. It was because his views were largely so sensible in this area that he must have felt constrained, with others of his friends, to leave the Labour party when it started proposing the sort of loony rubbish that we have heard tonight and that he could no longer stand. So we all look forward to having him back and contributing again to the defence debate, and long may he this time remain a member of the Committee.

May I also congratulate the hon. Gentleman, in slightly different vein, on taking on the arduous task of defence responsibility for both his own party and the Liberal party. This, it is stressed, is only temporary, and for that he must be somewhat grateful. In view of the sensible speech that the hon. Member has just made, has made in the past and will no doubt make in the future, and the largely sensible comments of the leader of his party, and comparing them with one or two of the remarks of the Liberal Members, higlighted in their conference last summer when they were propounding even more loony policies than are coming out of the Liberal party at the moment, it will be a difficult circle for him to square, and I shall watch with some affectionate amusement his attempts to do that and convince us that he really does speak for both those parties whose defence policies are so different.

I should like to make two brief points about the Army and our forces as I have been fortunate to see them in the past months. Before I do that, however, I have to put on record my utter disgust at the sheer irresponsibility of the remarks made by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on the radio yesterday. There was a minor accident involving the sliding of a large vehicle off the road into a ditch which the hon. Gentleman —on reflection, he must know that he was going too far —compared with Chernobyl. Two things need to be said about this.

First, the hon. Gentleman said that it was crazy that anyone should be moving military equipment about in the winter. Will he please tell the Russians that? If he can get an agreement that they will stop the moment the first snowflake falls and do nothing in the military field until the spring sun has melted all their snows, I am certain that my right hon. Friend will be very keen to accommodate them in this matter. But as long as we have to be ready all the time, prepared all the time, and when our defence forces have at all times to be at complete readiness for any untoward attack, vehicles will have to be moved in the snow and ice and there will be the odd mishap.

I entirely agree with the Ministry of Defence policy never to state publicly what it is moving and where. That can only help the enemy. Our people do not need to know; they just need to know that they are properly defended. But even if we were moving any form of nuclear warhead, for the hon. Gentleman to compare the likelihood of a similar accident with an inert, unarmed warhead, with a fully working, unsafe reactor can only frighten the ignorant. Since he is not one of the ignorant, it is too irresponsible for me to let the matter pass.

The Select Committee has had the chance to see quite a bit of the British Army in the last two or three months, most notably in the exercise in Oman to which my right hon. Friend the Minister of State referred. We were there for the large part of the active bit of that exercise and I want to add my congratulations on the way that our services mounted that exercise. It was an outstanding achievement in joint service co-operation. From the initial planning to the mounting of the operation—the getting out of the Tornados for the first time, flying in a single stage of about 11 hours from the United Kingdom with two refuellings — was an amazingly good technical achievement. The planning of the joint staffs to get the naval forces, the Royal Marines, the Army and the Air Force all there at the right time, with the capability to do their job, drew unbounded admiration from everybody who watched it.

We went out before dawn for the major day of the exercise. As dawn broke we saw the naval task force about three miles offshore. We saw the Marine commandos come in and land across the beaches, with the naval helicopters bringing in the support, the live artillery, the weapons and the equipment that were needed. Later that morning we saw the drop of the 2nd Battalion of the Parachute Regiment. All these operations were carried out with the sort of professional skill that we have come to expect but which nevertheless we admire and which ought to be put on record.

The whole of that exercise has done nothing but good, not only for the confidence of our services but for the respect in which the professionalism of those services is held throughout the western world. In addition, the co-operation of a friendly Government in that very sensitive area of the world, which incidentally was watched by many representatives of the other Gulf states, can only have increased the awareness of potential enemies or aggressors in that part of the world that we are prepared to help our friends. We have the capability. My goodness me, if they try anything, we will do it, and do it well.

We were in Oman for four or five days and during the rest of our time we had a chance to see not only the Omani services at work but those many individuals from the three services here who are serving with the Sultan of Oman's forces either on loan or on contract. We met many of them. Their morale was high. They are adding a professional dimension to the Sultan's forces which are growing in efficiency day by day and are being taken over more and more by Omani-trained and Omani native officers and other ranks who are bringing those forces into a state of readiness second to none in the Gulf. The work that is being done by our service men out there on contract is absolutely exemplary.

The second point which I want to raise about the armed forces involves the Brigade of Gurkhas. We had the opportunity, while we were in Hong Kong, to visit their training establishment and to see the high state of their morale and their professionalism in the job that they do in training Ghurkhas to stand side by side with some of the finest units in the British Army.

There is a problem behind that—the ending of the lease in Hong Kong in 10 years' time. The Select Committee has been addressing itself to that problem for some time. We have been concerned about the future of the Brigade of Gurkhas, and 18 months ago we asked the MOD to outline its thinking to us. That prompted an announcement by the then Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), in September 1985 that there would a continuing role for the Gurkhas after 1997 within the British Army. So it is from that basis that we start. He also said that the final size and shape of the Gurkhas would turn on operational resource factors facing the entire British Army at the time, which it was too early to foresee at that stage.

Given the time which those now joining can expect to serve, and given the unique contribution of the Gurkhas to our armed forces and the importance of this relationship not only to ourselves but to the kingdom of Nepal, the Committee has said that during the present Session of Parliament it will look into the whole question of how some of the political problems can be addressed. I hope that this will be of help to the House when we report and to the Ministery of Defence which is still considering this matter from many points of view.

Speaking for myself, may I say how delighted I am that that remark was made about the Gurkhas remaining with us after 1997 and how strongly I feel personally that nothing should be done to alter that? I am very fortunate and proud to have the serving battalion of Gurkhas in the United Kingdom in my constituency. I shall spend a day with them in a week or two's time. I have seen them before and I know well how professionally they operate alongside the rest of the British Army. Indeed, we know the sterling service that they performed when they went as a unit of the British Army to the Falklands conflict.

There will be difficulties. There are problems that have to be solved, but the knowledge that we shall have the Gurkhas as part of our fighting forces for the foreseeable future after we have given Hong Kong back to the Chinese is a great comfort to me. I am certain that it is a great comfort to all those who know how well and how loyally the Gurkhas have served us over the years.

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): So far the debate has been quite interesting but I should like to issue a warning to Conservative Members that it is unwise to rubbish the statements of my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). We want an adult debate, not an infantile debate. Whether Conservative Members like it or not, a debate is going on amongst the ordinary citizens of this country as to what the role of the conventional forces will be and whether we are to have a role as a nuclear nation. That debate will not go away. If Conservative Members were to follow the early statements of their leader, they would welcome the debate. Certainly I welcome it.

I am not a unilateralist or a pacifist but we have to get rid of the original thinking on the Government side which could be dangerous, namely, the Field Marshal Earl Haigh type of mentality that led us into disaster in the first war. Conservative Members should remember that in defence there is evolution. Situations change, weaponry changes and tactics change, so defence should not follow and never has followed rigid policies.

I am pleased that the ordinary serving members have been mentioned because this matter gives some concern. Conversations I have had with men serving in the regular forces are somewhat frightening. Because of the large number of people who are unemployed, about 3 million, it is becoming increasingly difficult for those who have proudly served their corps or their regiment, in whatever rank, for 16 to 22 years to get jobs on leaving the services. Without doubt these men are exceptionally well qualified to take jobs in civilian life but I am beginning to discern some discrimination.

The matter was brought to my attention by officers who, after retirement from the forces, applied for civilian jobs in various parts of the public service—for example, with police authorities. Because they have received an army pension at the age of 47 to 50 they are considered not to be the type of person to employ even though they may have superior qualifications. I name Northumbria police. I understand that Cleveland constabulary and the Devon and Cornwall constabulary have taken a similar view. I have referred just to the police but other parts of the public service are also denying those men employment because they have served in and obtained pensions from Her Majesty's forces. The matter requires attention. The Minister should send a quiet word to the responsible authorities. I might add that these decisions are not all being made by Left-wing loonies.

The conditions for the serving men are, without any doubt, far superior to the conditions when I and some of my colleagues served in the armed forces. However, there is still a grouse about housing conditions. I am aware that regimental welfare officers are doing their best. However, the main problem arises from the fact that some of the houses that were built 30 or 40 years ago now require modernisation. The Minister may care to consider that and decide whether any financial resources can be allocated for the improvement of housing conditions.

I was heartened by the Minister's statement about equipment. There is no doubt that the amount of equipment going to the regular and the territorial forces is excellent. I have seen no signs of inferior equipment or any lack of equipment required by the personnel. I was especially impressed by the training efforts that take place within the Territorial Army.

I live in the northern area from which two out of five of the people who serve in the armed forces at present originate. Catterick and Otterburn are in this northern area, and there is a long tradition relating to the armed forces because in depressions, in wartime and during periods of relative prosperity, there has never been a problem of obtaining recruits. The Minister mentioned the 200th anniversary of the Corps of Royal Engineers. However, there are regiments in the north that can claim a foundation of 312 years or more. The Royal Engineers are simply apprentices as yet.

One day I should like the Minister to visit the territorial battalions in the area. I should like to extend an invitation to him to come on a regimental day and see the St. George's day parade of the 6th Battalion Royal Regiment of Fusiliers. If he comes, he will see the equipment and the vigour of the men on display and he will be very proud of that.

I would also like the Minister to consider the speech made before Christmas by the senior officer responsible for the Territorial Army. When addressing the Northern Territorial Association, the senior officer made a prophetic statement. He advised the officers responsible for training to remember that the men, while they are being trained to a degree of efficiency, are also civilians. They have a life to lead beyond the armed forces. He said that over-training may be a factor that could discourage recruitment. In other words, he said that the men should be trained but that the training should be balanced with an interest and a belief in the service of the Territorial Army. I wonder whether the Corps of Royal Marines is possibly relying too much on training and de-humanising people to the extent that people have to have another life as well as a commitment to that magnificent corps.

One of the problems faced by the Territorial Army is how to deal with recruits who wish to serve in the Territorial Army, but who are unemployed. A greater number of recruits would join the Territorial Army from among the unemployed if we were to straighten out the financial position relative to deductions of unemployment benefit while the unemployed serve a day, several days or parts of days with the Territorial Army. That problem has never been satisfactorily resolved. It is unfair that some people in employment serving in the Territorial Army do not have daily pay or salary deducted yet they can rightly claim the appropriate allowances. That is a deterring factor in the recruitment from among the unemployed.

I understand that in the northern region there is a good core of Territorial Army officers waiting for other ranks to be recruited. In the north-east—and on Tyneside in particular — it may now be an appropriate time to consider the formation of another infantry battalion. I am sure that that would soon get up to strength and that there would be no problems of officer recruitment.

The British people have always had some regard for the armed forces. There is a tradition because of our imperial role and because people have had sons, brothers, uncles or grandfathers who have been killed in the service of the country or who have served the country. We like to know what is happening in the Army and we want to see its profile kept at the right level. We want the best of the British Army to be displayed.

In conclusion, there should be a little more swank on display than has previously been the case. That swank could be in the best interests and be one of the best morale builders for the Army. I hope that the Minister will consider my point. I could carry on at length and describe my experiences with the Western European Union on which I served for seven years as a delegate pursuing harmonisation. However, perhaps we can debate that at some other time.

7.6 pm

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): I congratulate the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) on his remarks about the unemployed and the Territorial Army. There are difficulties, but I am certain that they can be easily surmounted. I also agree with the hon. Gentleman that the public is concerned about defence. Although that may not figure as the major issue, it will certainly be an important feature in the next election. I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman on that point.

Mr. Garrett: I must apologise to the hon. Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Dr. Glyn) for not giving full attention to his speech. I am a member of a Standing Committee and a whisper has reached my ears that I should go and vote in the Committee. I hope that it will not be considered discourteous if I leave the Chamber in two or three minutes' time.

Dr. Glyn: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that explanation; otherwise I might have thought that he was leaving for other reasons.

In common with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Sir A. Buck) and the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), I have a vested interest as I represent the garrison constituency of Windsor and Maidenhead, and have similar problems.

I want to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister on the improvements that he has managed to achieve in the services. I may be wrong — if I am perhaps I will be corrected—but I believe that some of the improvements have been achieved not only by injecting more money but by making economies in the service. Many of the improvements are very important. Some may be minor, for example, the improvements in night sights, but nevertheless they are important.

Although this is a debate on the Army, as many hon. Members have observed, it has developed into a more general defence debate. I do not think that that is in any way to be discouraged. After all, the Army is a major part of NATO and of our defences. To a large extent, the NATO defences are dependent on the Army as opposed to the other forces. The other armed forces are not vital to the support of NATO.

According to the NATO Review 1986:

"the Soviet aim could be the improvement of their conventional forces, in quantity and quality, to support a strategy and policy of peace by dominance".

The review continues by saying that the Soviet conventional forces such as FROG-7 bring a

"realisation of the growing disparity between the balance of forces" in the Soviet Union and our own. This includes the ability to move troops from other areas such as the border with China, the Urals and various other parts of Russia. It is possible that the forces at their command are much greater than we imagined them to be.

The right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) referred to nuclear weapons. He fails to recognise that the reason for 40 years of peace is the independent nuclear deterrent. The hon. Member for Woolwich suggested that, if we were to change our policy, our American allies, who have been so loyal and generous to this country and to NATO, would withdraw altogether from NATO. That would be a major disaster. Our forces, even combined with United States forces, are probably superior in quality but numerically they are inferior to the Warsaw pact countries. To what extent can the Warsaw pact countries fit nuclear battlefield weapons on to soft vehicles and tanks?

I regard chemical warfare and its effect on the efficiency of our forces as a very important issue. The efficiency of an army that has to fight wearing anti-chemical clothing is grossly impaired. It is stated on pages 19 and 21 that the number of countries that have chemical capabilities have increased from five in 1977 to 15. We have seen horrible pictures of the results of the mustard gas warfare in the far east. Let us hope that it will never be used in Europe.

Will the Minister tell the House how much advance notice there will be of the use of these weapons? When will the troops have to put on this very heavy and difficult equipment? Will they have advance notice of one hour, or two hours or more? Clothing of that nature must decrease efficiency.

A great deal of work has been done on the interchangeability of weapons and spare parts in wartime between our NATO allies. If, say, a tank lacks a piece of equipment, it is no use offering something that is measured in millimetres instead of inches, because it would be quite useless. Missiles and equipment must be interchangeable throughout NATO.

Paragraph 4.14 of the Defence Estimates states that we have 100,000 ground forces available for the defence of our homeland. Comparisons are invidious, but I am told that in Denmark 100,000 civilians are armed with rifles. They know the people who live in their villages, and if they saw strangers they would know how to react. If Denmark can arm 100,000 men with rifles, it makes the number of men who are armed in our country look rather small. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces said that the numbers are being increased. Paragraph 4.15 states that three out of the new infantry battalions are to be used for home defence. It is most important to defend one's own country and to ensure that people are properly trained to do that job. We do not want a private army; we want properly organised forces with modern equipment that can be used at very short notice. The age of people does not matter too much, provided that they are fit. What matters is that they should be trained and properly organised.

May I refer, as a purely domestic matter, to the rebuilding of one of the barracks in my constituency? Apart from Combermere barracks, which is the Household Cavalry barracks, Victoria barracks is being rebuilt. I am pleased that at last a start has been made upon its rebuilding. We were held up by a minor problem —the moving of a very old main sewer that ran under the barracks. For security reasons it had to be replaced.

Unfortunately, the contractors chose a steel sheet piling apparatus that annoyed the residents and did great damage in the locality. It caused a rift between the citizens and those who were rebuilding the barracks. Unfortunately, the structural engineers, Sir Alexander Gibbs, approved the contractors' methods. I contacted the person with ultimate responsibility, the chairman of the water board, Roy Watts, and within a short time the noise and inconvenience had stopped and another method was employed. I am told that this will not delay the final date of completion of the barracks. A battalion of footguards will then be installed once more in proper quarters.

Windsor will be all the richer for the presence of that battalion. It will be easier for it to mount guard every day. I understand that, apart from completion of the barracks, the delightful grass square is to be preserved. Those fine barracks will be worthy of the Household Division . It will be able to serve Windsor in comfortable quarters for a very long time. I hope that the Minister will support me, as have all previous Ministers, and ensure that there are no hitches and that the barracks are completed on time.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): During the speech of the hon. Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Dr. Glyn) I was tempted to call out, "Ordure, ordure." I regret the problems that had to be faced in replacing the barracks and the relocation of the sewer and I am delighted to hear that they have been sorted out.

There are a number of points that I want to make, and I notice that the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement is twitching because of the long printouts that I am holding. I promise him that most of them are sheets of blank paper. I cannot find any way of stopping my computer from printing out two lines on one page and then changing to the next sheet of paper to print out the next two lines. I promise the House that I do not intend to read it all out. I would never dream of abusing your authority, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by doing any such thing.

Defence is an important subject and I regret that the contributions to the debate relating to the general approach to strategy, doctrine and the equipment used by our forces are coming mainly from the Labour Benches. I do not understand how the Conservatives can complacently lean back and accept the NATO strategy of flexible response given the age of that strategy and given the fact that defence technology does not stand still. Moreover, the strategy of the Warsaw pact does not stand still. Yet, here we are, in 1987 arguing on the basis that, somehow or other, a strategy that is almost 20 years old is the correct strategy to defend Europe.

I can assure the House that that view is not shared by the people to whom I spoke to when I visited NATO headquarters shortly before Christmas. General Rogers certainly does not believe that there is a sufficiently strong conventional defence on the western plain of Europe.

Politics in the United States has certainly not stood still. As a result of the recent elections in the United States the leadership in the House of Representatives has changed and there are different people in charge of important committees. Senator Nunn has been outspoken in his view that the other countries in Europe ought to play their full part — a more significant role — in the conventional defence of Europe.

General Rogers considers that the Warsaw pact forces have a 6:1 superiority over NATO forces in Europe in numerical if not operational terms. We should address ourselves to that problem. It is not good enough for the Minister to stand up and say how well he did last year in increasing the numbers in the Territorial Army by a thousand. Does the Minister believe that he is addressing the main problem?

We are well aware that the standard military doctrine is that if one is in a defensive position it takes a 3:1 superiority to overcome that dug-in defensive position. That is the position that NATO has taken. The fact that the Warsaw pact has a numerical superiority of 6:1— effectively it is probably 4·5:1—means that NATO is not in a good position. We must find the additional conventional forces to commit to NATO.

We are not helped by the kneejerk reactions that we get from the Conservatives. We know that we have to cut our coat according to the cloth, and if that cloth is such that our primary role is within NATO—the Scotland/Iceland trench and the British Army of the Rhine—we accept that. But if there is a grandiose vision that the use of Trident D5 missiles overrides that role it is too complacent. It is not in the best interests of the defence of this nation.

I listen with surprise to some of the statements made by Caspar Weinberger. I do not know of any radar system in existence that can detect the difference between the Union flag and the Stars and Stripes on the nose of a Trident D5 missile. Mr. Weinberger seems to be gloriously unaware of that and the way in which we could drag America into a nuclear holocaust, against its will, because nobody in Moscow will worry too much about which flag is painted on that missile. If the missile is incoming, Russia will react.

The Labour party believes that we must spend money on the conventional defence of Europe. We need to increase our ability to fight a conventional war and we need to give a testimony of our commitment to that. I wonder at the complacency of the Ministry of Defence. An army cannot fight without ammunition.

I am privileged to have in my constituency the royal ordnance factory of Birtley and the work force of that factory is concerned because ammunition orders that were expected have not appeared. Unless those orders appear the pre-ordering of raw materials or specialist metals cannot take place. I am told that the factory has not received an order for 105FD ammunition—I do not know what they will fire out of the Abbott gun when they run out of the existing stock of shells. Without extra supplies of 105FDs no ammunition will be available for practice use and so on. We must have those orders.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) mentioned that, significantly, the Minister failed to make any mention of the SP70 weapon system—I find that very odd. Britain, Germany and Italy are, as far as we in this House are aware—we have had no statement to the contrary—committed to replacing the 105 Abbott gun with the 155 mm SP70. That weapon has several advantages, one of them being that it can fire the same ammunition as the 155 mm FH70 main battlefield howitzer. It would be a logical thing to rationalise ammunition.

We have heard nothing about it and I wonder why. Is it because the Germans have gone sour about the idea? Certainly there was some press speculation that the Germans were insisting on changes of specification and other things and that the background to those changes was not that they were needed but that the Germans were trying to delay the system being introduced. Is it that Rheinmetall is not capable of making the shells? I have no evidence to show that Rheinmetall has ever managed to deliver the FH70 ammunition that was ordered from it. I know that the Army needs about 50,000 rounds of FH70 ammunition for the coming year, but so far no order has been placed. No order has been placed at Birtley and as far as I am aware no order has gone to Germany. I look forward to the Minister's reply and I hope that he will be able to tell me whether the Germans have ever delivered any ammunition.

If the Army needs 50,000 rounds of FH70 ammunition, and if it asks Birtley to tender for that order, it will be met with a keen response. It will get a product that complies, in all ways, with the specifications, because Birtley has successfully made that ammunition for years. I hope that the Minister will go ahead and order that ammunition and he will also order 105FD ammunition that is needed for the Abbott gun.

Three years ago, when General Rogers gave evidence to the Senate Defence Committee, he said that one of the areas about which he was worried was the readiness of artillery in Europe. He said that gun crews had the opportunity to fire only one practice round per month. In my opinion that is a good way of ensuring that the artillery is inaccurate, if not downright dangerous to one's forward troops.

I hope that the Minister will give us the assurance that he will place the ammunition orders. I hope that he will assure the House that there are sufficient rounds to enable the proper practice that will enable the Royal Artillery to achieve the levels of accuracy for which it is famed.

I am also told that we are short of 76 mm shells as well. Where is the order for that? What is most puzzling is that the Minister did not mention the royal ordnance factories. We are aware that various companies have shown an interest in those factories and that such companies are trundling around the royal ordnance factories. We are aware of the ability of those factories to supply the Army with its needs—the Under-Secretary will recall that we went on about that at great length in the Committee on that particular Bill. The Labour party is concerned about the royal ordnance factories. We want the ammunition that the Army needs as well as the ability to produce it safely, at a reasonable price and to a standard that does not pose a hazard to the troops using it. We are not convinced that the Minister's proposals or what is apparently happening will give us that. I hope that the Minister will tell us tonight whether he intends to dispose of the royal ordnance factories before the next general election, and if so what he is doing about that. A statement would have been welcome.

Indeed, I would have applied for a debate under Standing Order No. 20 but for the fact that I knew that this debate would be held today and that my application would have been automatically refused as a result. However, that does not mean that the Minister does not need to say anything about the matter. It is important, and has been the subject of much press speculation during the past week. It is certainly of great concern to my constituents and to the constituents of every hon. Member with a royal ordnance factory in his area. I therefore hope that the Minister will answer that point tonight.

I fully support what the Minister and my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli have said about the efficiency, effectiveness and professionalism of the British Army. We are proud of it and it is entiled to our support. However, that support should be given on the basis that I have outlined and should not be the subject of ministerial complacency.

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): It is a pleasure to speak after the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam). During the Christmas period I visited his constituency and saw the excellent Metro-Centre there. But it is also a pleasure to follow him because of his remarks about the ammunition orders for Birtley. I spent a great deal of my youth in that town, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman's words will be well received by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State.

I particularly welcome what my right hon. Friend the Minister said about the Territorial Army, which is expanding well. Before too long we should examine the need to give NATO-committed Territorial Army infantry battalions an armoured personnel carrier capacity. Their susceptibility to air strikes is no less than that of a regular soldier. Moreover, it just so happens that the engines for those vehicles are almost certain to be made in my constituency. Thus I have a vested interest, but I look forward to the day when our Territorial Army battalions are armour plated.

The Labour party's emphasis on conventional defence will have to withstand a lot of scrutiny as the election approaches. Indeed, the International Institute for Strategic Studies, in its publication "The Military Balance", has shown that Warsaw pact tanks and tactical aircraft have a superiority over NATO of 2:1 and that Warsaw pact artillery has a superiority of 3:1. Consequently, it is not fair to claim that our forces are matched in any way. Moreover, many serving soldiers will want to know what response there could be to the deployment of battlefield chemical and biological weapons. If we cannot retaliate with nuclear weapons, our front-line troops will have no protection, and are no doubt well aware of that fact.

I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) has attended the debate, because the new Sir John Moore barracks in Winchester was opened just before Christmas. It was moved from Shrewsbury, which was a matter of great regret to the people of that town. The barracks will be sadly missed. The new barracks forms a splendid training centre, and the people of Shropshire wish it and the people of Winchester well.

In Shropshire we now have a revamped Territorial Army battalion in the 5th Battalion The Light Infantry, in which I serve as a major. The new Yorkshire battalion, the 8th Battalion The Light Infantry, is wished well by the county. Indeed, the move towards county identities for Territorial Army battalions will help the civilian population to identify with them, as well as helping the units themselves.

Before Christmas, I was privileged to attend the annual general meeting of the Shropshire cadet force, as Member for Shrewsbury. Hon. Members have already praised our regular service personnel and many of the Territorial Army units, but a special word needs to be said about those people, particularly adults, who devote a great deal of time to our cadet forces. Their work is unpaid, but those adults give young people an outlet for their energies and often an opportunity to sample military training. Indeed, many of the cadets go into regular service with the armed forces. Such work is not only a gesture to the community but helps young people to decide whether a military career is for them.

As the economic climate improves, more and more potential and serving Territorial Army soldiers and officers will need the co-operation of employers. Perhaps the mammoth procurement power of the Ministry of Defence should be turned towards considering whether we need a voluntary employer's code on Territorial Army and reservist employee involvement. Such a code could be seen as a gesture of national responsibility from employers who already receive enormous Ministry of Defence contracts. As has often been said in Territorial Army discussions, some employers are far from encouraging when it comes to allowing people time off to attend annual camps. However, fortunately, the majority of employers are good, and encourage such activities.

The hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) made a very good speech and demonstrated that the armed forces need not be a political football to be kicked around between the different parties. People in the armed forces support parties of all political persuasions and it is only right that that should be recognised. The hon. Gentleman's point about DHSS contributions being a problem was very telling. For several years we have been promised that the problem would be resolved, but it has still not been resolved, and it is causing immense problems for those who are unemployed and who lose their benefit when they claim pay for a Territorial Army training day. There is inevitably a delay because of all the bureaucracy to ensure that money is paid correctly. However, I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State has taken that point on board.

In previous debates I mentioned the possibility of national service in the Territorial Army along Swiss lines. But, as happens whenever national service is suggested, that idea was pooh-poohed rapidly by both friend and foe alike. The falling birth rate will clarify the personnel position towards the end of this century, but in the next 10 years there is likely to be a 25 per cent. drop in the number of young men of military age. Moreover, I understand that there will be 1 million fewer men aged between 20 and 29 at the turn of the century. That is bound to have an effect on normal recruiting patterns. A switch to a conventional defence only policy, as advocated by the Opposition, will almost inevitably mean that the required levels of manpower can be achieved only by compulsory military service. I look forward to that debate being held at a future Labour party conference.

I crave the indulgence of the House, because I rarely like to speak for more than 10 minutes but on this occasion wish to do so. I must ask my right hon. and hon. Friends who are waiting to speak to be patient. Just before Christmas a company in my constituency was attacked in a debate on 12 December on defence projects and exports. Sadly, none of those hon. Members who criticised that company had the courtesy to advise me that they were about to do so. However, before today's debate I took the liberty of writing to the hon. Members for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) and for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and to my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour) advising them that I intended to raise the subject of the DROPS contract. I refer to column 712 of the Official Report for 12 December 1986 and to early-day motion 342, which also contains the name of the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright).

In that debate, the hon. Member for Yeovil made several specific allegations, some of which were echoed by the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North. From the company's point of view at least, it is important that the record should be made clear. He made a number of allegations especially to my hon. Friend the Minister that the Minister of Defence was allowing

"an unwitting export . . . to the Soviet Union."

Yet the Multilift hooklift mark IV system, which is the point of the controversy, will specifically not be offered to any Eastern bloc country. That has never been proposed and such a thing has never been substantiated. Even if Multilift wished to export that system—clearly it does not—it would be subject to stringent export licensing control from the Ministry of Defence and from the Department of Trade and Industry. Accusations along that line were wholly without basis.

Secondly, it was claimed that the Multilift system

"bears a startling resemblance to the system proposed by Boughton."

The hon. Member for Yeovil said:

"There may have been some leakage of technical information from Boughton." — [Official Report, 12 December 1986; Vol. 107, c. 712.]

That suggests that there has been a bit of jiggery-pokery behind the scenes, yet no claims have ever been made against Multilift in my constituency. Multilift retained top London patent lawyers to ensure that there was no infringement of anyone's patent. Boughton has been repeatedly urged by the Ministry of Defence to enter discussions on allegations of breach of intellectual property. That has not been done at any stage. Therefore, it is not on for the hon. Members for Yeovil and for Woolwich, who added his name to the early-day motion, to continue to make those accusations without substantiating them.

The hon. Member for Yeovil suggested that Multilift was a supplier to the Soviet truck company, Kamaz. Multilift has never supplied hydraulic systems to Kamaz and its parent group Partek AB, which is based in Finland, has never engaged in any work for an Eastern bloc military organisation. Multilift staff have told me that categorically. If any hon. Member has evidence to the contrary, he is duty bound to produce it and to give my hon. Friends at the Ministry an opportunity to examine the case.

The hon. Member for Yeovil claimed that it was evident that the contractor chosen by the Ministry of Defence supplied similar systems to the Soviet Union, probably to the Soviet army. That accusation had no basis of truth whatever and I challenge him to substantiate it.

The question remains whether the Ministry of Defence should have chosen a Finnish-owned company to be involved in the tender process for the DROPS — ammunition lift — project. Partek AB was formed in 1898. It is a public company in Finland with 13,000 shareholders, 38 per cent. of whom are private individuals. It could not be argued with the best Machiavellian mind in the world that it is a Soviet front organisation trying to inveigle its way into the Ministry of Defence supply organisation. It is a long-standing, highly reputable, substantially privately owned company. Its activities are in minerals and concrete production, building and insulation materials and hydraulic mounted equipment. Less than 5 per cent. of its Finnish turnover is with Eastern bloc countries, supplying them with hydraulics for refuse collection vehicles. Its hydraulic and commercial systems were developed were in the 1960s. If the basis of the argument is that we should not be involved in that, we might as well prevent British Gas from supplying gas to Army barracks in Britain because it is involved in a pipeline with the Soviet Union. The suggestion that normal commerical contracts should not go on with the Soviet Union has never been proposed by any party in this House.

Multilift, the company in my constituency which is part of the Finnish group, was formed in 1968. It has 160 employees with a turnover of £12 million. It makes not only the military equipment which is being offered to the Ministry of Defence but also refuse collection vehicles— in which it has a 30 per cent. market share — and demountables. It has more than a 50 per cent. share of the United Kingdom market whereas Boughton, whose supporters have been so highly critical of the Multilift contract, has less than 20 per cent. of the United Kingdom commercial market.

That must be seen by the House against the criticism that Multilift has come out of nowhere to grab a contract to which it has no right — or so the opponents of Multilift and the supporters of Boughton will have it. For Multilift, DROPS is a 100 per cent. United Kingdom procurement and manufacturing project. Fortunately, it brings 50 extra jobs to Shrewsbury and I cannot for the life of me understand why the Liberal party has opposed it so vehemently without ever checking with the Multilift management or myself to see whether their repeated allegations have any base whatever.

Multilift is an excellent company with a good management team whom I meet regularly. Its members are dynamic and have integrity. To suggest that they would have any part in supplying the Soviet army with equipment is plainly ridiculous.

Sadly, the controversy on the DROPS project will not go away. There has been a "Panorama" programme on it and countless questions on the Order Paper from my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour), myself and other hon. Members. A paragraph or two about the basis of the DROPS report may help lay this particular ghost to rest.

Eleven years ago, in 1975, Multilift supplied to the Ministry of Defence a special demountable for handling 20 ft long flat-racks. It was put on trial in the United Kingdom and Germany and proved to be all right on highway work but was not suited to cross-country conditions. Between 1976 and 1978 the Ministry of Defence examined the products of all appropriate United Kingdom demountable equipment manufacturers and a wide range of equipment was tested. In 1978 the Ministry of Defence purchased four commercial demountables from Boughton and they were fitted to in-service Foden trucks. That was to help assess the requirement for the Army. At that stage it was a feasibility study and it may well have been rejected.

From 1978-82, tests indicated that DROPS offered productivity savings, and a requirement was formulated and later that year the Ministry of Defence issued a statement of requirement to 43 companies, giving them 20 weeks for a response.

In 1983, Multilift was picked for trialling along with Powell Duffryn in second place. Heathfield Engineering got third place, using a Multilift lifting system, and Volvo got fourth place, again with Multilift kit. Boughton, the subject of all the controversy, got fifth place. Foden and Scammell were chosen by the Ministry of Defence as the two main chassis contractors.

In 1985, after a year's trialling, the Multilift system was chosen and in 1986 Foden and Scammell were confirmed as the main chassis contractors. Boughton's case has been given substantial airing on television and in the Chamber, both in debate and via questions. In 1978, Boughton was in a favoured position, having supplied the equipment for the feasibility study. Obviously, seeing a major requirement developing, Boughton adopted a strategy which, sadly for the company, turned out to be wrong. The company went for a new "vehicle system" incorporating many new and radical ideas which were subsequently not accepted. It expected the Ministry of Defence's DROPS specification to be written around its vehicle ideas which, again, sadly did not happen.

Boughton designed a new load handling system that could be used only with its own vehicle. That, again, turned out not to be the case. Having taken so many false premises along that product development, Boughton surely has no right to expect a favoured position. Its commercial equipment was purchased for concept trials by the Government and the Ministry of Defence eventually left the solution of the loading to manufacturer response, who, of course, had given performance parameters to work to.

[Mr. Derek Conway]

My hon. Friend the Minister and the noble Lord Trefgarne have examined this case again and again. There is no evidence of foul play, and the Auditor-General will report to Parliament on the DROPS project in due course. No doubt the matter will be aired again then. My hon. Friend the Minister and his Department should now consider that Boughton is one of two finalists for a new 4 × 4 vehicle. I hope that it will not be given the contract simply to keep it quiet or happy and to calm friends in high places.

Boughton lost the DROPS contract to Shrewsbury in an open and fair competition. I say to its supporters, especially those in the Liberal party, that it is now time to put up or shut up.

7.48 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I thank the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway) for recognising that people in the armed forces vote for all parties and that the armed forces are not the preserve of one particular party. Thirty-five years ago I was in a tank crew as a national service man on the north German plain, like many others of my age group. Therefore, I remain especially sensitive to people who say that the British Army of the Rhine is vulnerable to some sort of threat. I refer to the exchange between my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) and the Minister on the subject of a short-range Soviet nuclear capability against 1 Corps.

What consideration has been given to the assessment that may have been made in Moscow after Chernobyl of what would happen to Mother Russia herself if a nuclear holocaust or nuclear attack were to be launched against western Europe? We have had enough trouble with caesium 137 in the Outer Hebrides and the mountains of Wales. Given a prevailing south-west wind, is there a cow, a calf, a sheep or a lamb anywhere between Minsk and Leningrad that could graze safely? There is not. Three days after Russia used nuclear weapons in western Europe there would be considerable trouble in the Russian homeland. That, rather than the British possession of nuclear weapons, is the safeguard against the vulnerability argument with which the Minister tried to persuade my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli.

What assessment has been made, in the light both of what we know has happened since Chernobyl and the agricultural difficulties that we have faced, of a Russian attack anywhere in western Europe on Russia herself?

Secondly, I should like to say a word about procurement. Today the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement answered the question:

"if he will hold discussions with Plessey about the eventual control of high-technology development as a result of its £1,100 million agreement with Boeing; and whether it will pass to American control."

He answered, "I shall answer shortly." I make no complaint about the answer. All I ask for is a considered reply. This is a difficult subject and it is better that it should be considered rather than answered within three days.

In the same breath I draw to the Minister's attention the problem of Electronic Data Systems, on which I have tabled questions and about which David Rose of The Guardian has written. I refer to a memorandum from EDS in the name of Lana Lewallen dated 10 May 1985. It is addressed to staff coming to Britain from the United States to work on electronic data systems. I have given copies of it to the Treasury and in a letter to Ministers at the Home Office. It states:

"For TDYs, the answers to these questions are crucial because you can be denied entry into the country with the wrong answers. Since you are on temporary assignment here, you are only CONSULTING during your stay here. According to British Immigration Authorities, that is not 'business'. Therefore, do not reply 'business' or 'work' because you are NOT, according to their definition. An acceptable answer to the first question is 'pleasure'. It is acceptable, if you wish, to add that you may consult a bit for the London branch of your American employer. You may mention EDS, but do not mention BUPA. The best advice however is not to offer any information other than what you are specifically asked.

If you have family who are coming over with you or who will join you later, they should NEVER say they are coming to visit or stay with their spouse/parent who is working in London.

In answering the question 'how long will you be in the UK?', remember that you will probably leave the UK several times for trips abroad during your stay. Therefore, do NOT answer six months or four months because that is incorrect. Rather, you can state 'about four weeks at present' because that will be more factual.

When you do leave and re-enter the UK, please follow these same instructions. It is important that you know and adhere to these instructions upon entry. It is your responsibility to get yourself into the country; EDS cannot exempt anyone from passport control."

The memorandum states:

"You will also be queried as to 'the nature of your visit to the United Kingdom: business or pleasure?' and 'how long do you plan to be in the UK?'"

That raises questions about the possible deception of immigration authorities. My understanding is that the Home Office is looking into this whole matter. Does the Ministry of Defence want to award contracts, which may have a greater value than those for AWACs, to a company which behaves in that way towards British immigration control, rather than to Plessey, Racal or some other British company? As I say in my letter to the Minister of State, Treasury, who is co-ordinating the committee:

"What concerns me infinitely more is whether EDS, operating in such a way, is the type of company who should be given preference by the British taxpayer over Racal, Plessey or British Telecom. Not only do vast sums of money appear to be at stake, but a lot of high-tech research is clearly involved. If EDS were to get the contract, would that R and D at advanced level be done in the UK? I think the answer is no."

On 7 January David Rose wrote in The Guardian:

"The first check to EDS's plans for government contracts came in December, when the £10 million Passport Office computer was awarded to a British rival.

This followed the Guardian's disclosure that the firm had urged American staff to lie to immigration officials in order to work in Britain illegally, the admission by Mr. Ross Perot, the former EDS chairman, that he paid £2 million into a Swiss bank account as ransom for American hostages in the Middle East: he had been asked to do so by the disgraced Lt-Col Oliver North, the central figure in the Irangate scandal.

The loss of the contract came as a shock to EDS staff."

What is the position of the Ministry of Defence in relation to EDS?

I interrupted the Minister's opening speech to ask about the talks in Washington about the Falklands. It may be primarily a Foreign Office responsibility, but it is not sufficient for a Defence Minister simply to say that that does not concern the British Ministry of Defence. Certainly it does. Therefore, I look forward to some reconsideration of that in the Minister's reply.

Following my surgery on Saturday I wrote to the Secretary of State for Defence. Two constituents came to see me and were absolutely furious about what had happened to the Queen's Own Highlanders in Kenya, with which a relative of theirs is serving. I have put the matter in writing to the Secretary of State, but I might not have raised the matter had it not been for today's news. The high commission in Kenya has said that it greatly regrets that any instructions were given to service men not to go to Mombasa and the coast. Apparently the doctor attached to the forces is saying that he hopes that no more British service men will take leave on the coast. Which is right—the high commission or the forces?

The second part of the question arises from what my constituents told me. They said that their relative had told them—I do not know the accuracy of this—that the warning about AIDS on the coast had been given in a frivolous, ribald manner. I remember easily what happened in my national service days. The inimitable regimental sergeant-major, the late Frank Dodd, of the Royal Scots Greys used to say, "Be careful, lads. Remember your French letters when you leave the guardroom. Ho! ho!" That is how it was put. My hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers), who has great Army experience, knows exactly what I am talking about. Precisely what instructions were given and what warning was brought home to those men before they went on leave on the Kenyan coast? What is the Government's position as between our own high commission and the advice that is attributed to the Army doctor?

I should like now to discuss Army responsibilities and military intelligence as this is one of the few opportunities that hon. Members get to address such matters. I had the first question to the Prime Minister today and asked her whether she would place in the Library a copy of all correspondence conducted on her behalf between Sir Robert Armstrong and Mr. Chapman Pincher. The right hon. Lady replied:

"It remains inappropriate to comment on matters in issue in the Peter Wright case in Australia. I also intend to follow the precedent set by previous Governments of not commenting on security matters."

This is not the occasion to go into the merits of the Australian court case, and I shall not do so. However, I refer to the leader in The Scotsman on 16 December 1986, which stated:

"Tam Dalyell has a fair point when he asks, 'Is there any effective ministerial control over breaking into houses? Which Minister is responsible for any rules on breaking in?'".

I am referring to ministerial authorisation because, quite frankly, Mr. Chapman Pincher has told me on the telephone—I know him of old and believe him on this—that he did not collude in giving "Their Trade Is Treachery" in December 1980 to the Government agency involved. Therefore, it was either done from inside Sidgwick and Jackson or it was done by theft and housebreaking. Following my question to the Prime Minister, I should like to ask whether theft or housebreaking was involved and whether there was ministerial authorisation for burglary. We are concerned about ministerial control over state burglary.

I should like to know also how it came about that MI5 was apparently talking to Sir Robert Armstrong without the Attorney-General being consulted. An Army debate is the only time that one can raise such issues. Some of us might say that if the Attorney-General was not consulted that was because the Government did not want the Attorney-General to be in the position of having to ask awkward questions.

Precisely what is the ministerial control over military intelligence? What can Peter Wright have meant by saying that he took part in operations that were "deniable, authorised and illegal"?

That brings me to the activites of the Wilson years. You and I, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and several other hon. Members lived through those years and we can be forgiven for being extremely curious about what happened, because many strange things happened then.

The first time that I became interested in such matters was almost 20 years ago, when my friend—the friend of many hon. Members—the then Member of Parliament for Ealing, Acton, Mr. Bernard Floud, tragically took his own life. We wondered at the time what exactly had happened because it was public knowledge that the then Prime Minister, Mr. Harold Wilson, had understandably offered Bernard Floud junior ministerial office. That offer was withdrawn when an MI5 report—this was public knowledge at the time—suggested to the Prime Minister and to the Cabinet office that Bernard Floud was not a proper person to hold ministerial office. Some hon. Members will recollect that Bernard Floud took his own life in a gas-filled room.

I have talked about that to my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) and we should like to ask the Government, since we now know that Bernard Floud's MI5 monitoring officer went by the name of Peter Wright, whether there is not a case, even 20 years later, for Ministers calling for the Government agency security file on the Bernard Floud case, and making some sort of assessment. I am not asking to be shown that file but could not my right hon. Friend, a former Home Secretary, and a Privy Councillor, be shown it? If he says that everything is all right, that would satisfy me. Alternatively, the Government might think that it was the kind of thing that could be shown to the Leader of the Opposition.

Bernard Floud was a friend of some of us, and in the light of what we now know about Peter Wright being his monitoring officer and about what Peter Wright has said in the Australian court about burgling his way through London, we should like to know the agony that our friend the then Member of Parliament for Ealing, Acton was put through.

I refer to The Times of 10 December 1986, which asks, "What is a deniable operation?" Mr. Wright is quoted as saying:

"I have taken part in tens, possibly hundreds, of illegal operations, for which I might have been sent to prison, if detected."

Were those operations secretly authorised on the condition that they could be publicly disowned? Some of us would like to know the answer to that question. It could be said that that is raking up the past for the sake of raking up the past, but I reply to that in terms of the judgment in an Australian court six years ago of Mr. Justice Mason, who said:

"It is unacceptable that in our democratic society there should be a restraint on the publication of the information relating to a Government where the only vice of that information is that it enables the public to discuss, review, and criticise government action."

[Mr. Tam Dalyell]

In justifying myself for going back two decades, I refer to the noble Lord Dacre of Glanton, Professor Hugh Trevor-Roper, who, although a political opponent, did me the courtesy of writing a foreword to a book that I wrote. We are personal friends. He said that a country,

"as the price of protecting its present, it should yield up the records of its past."

Those are not the words of a Labour politician. They are the words not so much of the Conservative party as of the intellectual Right wing of British society.

Finally, I should like to give a short explanation. It is true that after much thought and discussion with colleagues, and with the agreement of the Leader of the Opposition, I have referred the case of the forged bank account of Lord Glenamara to the Security Commission. I thought that that was the proper way to do it and, quite frankly, that that would be more likely to get a serious reply than if I had sent it to Ministers.

The background is that Lord Glenamara — your friend and mine, Mr. Deputy Speaker, when he was known as Mr. Ted Short, our Chief Whip—asked me to look into the whole background of how he got into difficulties with a Swiss bank account which turned out to be forged.

I am asking present Ministers — regardless of how Lord Griffiths, Lord Justice Lloyd, Philip Allen, Sir Alan Cockerell, Sir Hugh Beech, Sir Alisdair Steedman and Sir Michael Palliser decided to act — to take some responsibility in looking up the files of those days and asking direct questions of the security services. I do not know whether the Security Commission, converting itself as it is entitled to do after asking Parliament's permission into a tribunal, is the best way to go about it. However, I am jolly sure that some of us are not going to let the Ted Short affair rest until such time as we have had an explanation. I use this Army debate with its connections with military intelligence to say that explanations are due from two decades and less ago.

8.9 pm

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): It was a great pleasure and extremely interesting to listen to the speech of the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett). It takes a lot of courage to make such a speech from the Labour Benches and I believe that what he said reflects much more accurately than his Front Bench colleagues the real grass-roots feeling of the Labour voter throughout the country. If I have my geography right, I believe that his constituency is included in the old recruiting area of the Northumberland Fusiliers.

My hon. Friend the Minister who is to wind up the debate is a Coldstreamer and I believe that Grenadiers and even Life Guards argue about which is the oldest regiment of the British Army. However, I believe that the Northumberland Fusiliers have the oldest battle honour in the British Army and contributed more battalions in the first world war than any other regiment. I wish that that same fighting spirit would grasp the Opposition Front Bench spokesmen.

I listened horrified to the opening speech of the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). It seemed that 1,000 years of our history and the painful lessons that we should have learnt about military preparedness have been completely, almost wilfully, forgotten. If there is one overriding lesson that those 1,000 years have taught us it is that we must be prepared and we must show our potential enemies that we are prepared. We are attacked whenever we show that we are weak or when we show a lack of determination to defend not only our country but our areas of vital interest. The Romans had a classic saying that if one wants peace one should prepare for war.

We have learned that, expensive as it is to prevent war by means of deterrence, the fact is that to fight a war is infinitely more expensive in terms of money and blood. Therefore, we must have that deterrence. We must be prepared to spend money on deterrence or on that insurance. It is the duty of Governments of any political persuasion in Britain to ensure that our nation is prepared and to ensure that we demonstrate a positive attitude towards defence, encourage our electorate to spend the necessary money on defence and ensure that the military force in this country is not only skilled but is equipped with modern and integrated weapon systems.

I believe that showing an attitude of determination to our defence is necessary for the home base, our NATO role and out of area. Switzerland is a classic example of a country that shows an active and positive determination to defend itself. It uses reserve forces and ensures that the military force is integrated with civil defence. I believe that we still have a lot to learn in that respect. I know that the Government have done much in that area in the past seven and a half years, but there is still more to be done.

Britain's contribution to NATO in terms of manpower and hardware and our attitude to NATO are crucial to morale within NATO. It certainly is when it comes to the support of the United States for NATO. As the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) said, quite correctly, the American people are getting a little impatient about the attitude of Europe towards its own defence. I believe that the Anglo-American relationship is probably the greatest force for peace in the world and is a key aspect underlying NATO. Therefore, our attitude towards NATO is critical to morale and effectiveness. The relationships within NATO are built upon mutual respect and required mutual effort.

I shall now deal with the out-of-area determination. I was pleased to hear of the exercise in Oman. Since 1980 I have said that we should look at the areas of vital interest to NATO and we should show a willingness and ability to look out of area and react. I believe that in the Falklands some of the advice given to Galtieri by his Foreign Minister, Costa Mendez, was based on the fact that Britain was locked into its NATO role, was over-stretched and would not have the physical ability to re-take the Falklands and that it had a lack of determination. Britain had retreated from east of Suez and the Mediterranean and it was felt that it would not be able to gird itself to play any defensive role in the Falklands. I believe that our willingness to liberate the Falklands was important on a global scale in showing an attitude towards out-of-area threat and our preparedness to deal with it.

Obviously, we do not just want peace at any price. We want peace with freedom. That costs big money. I know that the year ahead will bring some tough spending decisions and I wish my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Ministry of Defence good luck in their future battles on that front because there will be some tough decisions and I shall fully support what I would consider adequate spending on defence as I think that it is a vital insurance policy for our nation.

I now wish to deal with the skill of the military force and equipping it with modern integrated weapons systems. I believe that if we are to be able to afford and continue possessing updated and therefore modern and effective weapons systems, we have to make more efficient use of manpower. Obviously, I entirely support the philosophy of having a small, elite, highly trained professional basic army, but we must not misuse it. I believe that there is a danger that overstretch is starting to eat into recruitment and cause early retirement in the professional armed forces. That overstretch is very dangerous because we are losing top quality people at non-commissioned officer and officer level. It is something that the Government must look at as a matter of great concern.

The hon. Member for Woolwich mentioned the interesting change in demography and the future recruiting for the Armed Forces, not only in the professional Armed Forces, especially the Army, but for the reserves and the Territorial Army. I believe that the efficient use of manpower within the professional Army must increasingly lead us towards a greater integration with an enhanced Territorial Army. I know that the Government have done much to enhance the Territorial Army, not only in its numbers but in its quality, equipment and general efficiency. Serving in the Territorial Army I see that, and it is extremely gratifying. However, more has yet to be done as it has to be done within the reserves, the Home Service Force and civil defence. The Government are moving in the right direction and have done a lot, despite resistance from certain parts of the House. However, much more needs to be done in that area.

I should like to mention the academic training of officers at the Royal Military Academy, Sandhurst. I understand that the academic content of the course has been diluted until it is almost non-existent. One can ask particularly where money is important, why one should bother to give academic instruction when many potential officers will have been to university in the first place. But one must consider that some of those officers will not have gone to university. It is important, even if the officers are streamed at Sandhurst, that more emphasis is given to academic instruction.

The nuclear weapon has been invented; we cannot disinvent it. It exists. The argument about nuclear-free zones was dispelled by the situation in Japan in 1945 and by the recent disaster at Chernobyl, which showed that there are no such things as effective nuclear-free zones. As an existing weapon system, as long as they are efficient in their military use, nuclear weapons form part of an integrated, modern defence system. It is an absolute outrage to try to tell the British people that a non-nuclear defence policy for our nation is credible. The Socialist party's non-nuclear defence policy is hypocritical, impractical and misleading. Further, it is treacherous, and I believe that it knows that.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), was a very good Secretary of State for Defence, when one looks back at those years a few decades ago. He knows, despite the policy of the present Labour party, what the real defence issues are. It was interesting, at the time of the Socialist party conference in September 1986, to see him under the glare of the television lights. We saw him desperately searching for a peg upon which to hang both faces at one time—the face of non-nuclear defence, and the face for which he knows perfectly well that, when it comes to the reality of government in this country, there is no alternative.

The nuclear weapons system is part of an integrated weapons system for this country, and is the essence of our defence policy and the essence of rendering it credible on a strategic scale. The non-nuclear defence policy proposed by the Socialist party is extremely dangerous. It is hypocritical and misleading to the British public. It is treacherous to say that it is credible and that we shall still have a defence system if we put the money—even if that were to be true — into another area, such as conventional defence. In expressing my support for the Government, may I say that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friends on the Front Bench have done an excellent job. As I see it, from a worm's eye view in the Territorial Army, we must try to make the armed forces increasingly efficient, keep modern integrated weapons systems at their disposal, change the emphasis of manpower and use the reserves. The Government have shown great skill and a great feeling for defence, plus a feeling for prudent spending. The Government have struck a great balance and I praise my hon. Friend and his fellow Ministers for what they have done and offer them my strong support in fighting for prudent defence budgets in the future.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): I am very sad to have to follow that contribution from the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne). I do not think that I have ever heard a more arrogant and condescending speech since I have been in the House. The way that he patted my hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garret) on the head for believing—as many Labour Members do—that there might be some use for the Territorial Army was extremely condescending. To say that my hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend had courage to speak out like that because he was speaking for the Labour Benches was an insult to those of us who have served in the armed forces, not the Territorial Army.

Mr. John Browne: I served for 10 years.

Mr. Rogers: It was an insult to many of the working class, especially those in my constituency, who gave their lives in defence of this country. Unlike many from the hon. Member's class, they did not go into the secret service and act as spies for the Russians. The hon. Gentleman insults Labour Members by making such a speech.

Mr. Browne: Nonsense.

Mr. Rogers: I shall put my anger aside and get on with my contribution, and put the arrogance of the hon. Member for Winchester down to where he comes from. It shows how the Conservative party attempts to twist the position of Labour Members. We hope that over the coming months we shall be able properly to present our defence policy. In order to do so, we need some answers from Ministers.

In his opening statement today, and in last year's debate on the Army, my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) commented on the balance of spending within the armed forces and within the Army itself. He has posed many questions of detail, as well as the major issue of total funding with and without Trident spending. The Government have still not answered those crucial questions. The question that faces us in consideration of our defence budget is how we can maintain and develop our conventional forces and carry the enormous burden of funding a nuclear potential such as Trident. How far are we prepared to put our armed services into indefensible conventional positions so that we can fund weapons that will, supposedly, be their saviour against alleged overwhelming conventional Soviet forces? That is the crux of the matter when determining our defence priorities.

The Government have chosen what we on the Opposition Benches consider to be an untenable policy. We are committed to developing our conventional forces to a point where they will not need to be bailed out by nuclear weapons — nuclear weapons that will almost certainly destroy the defenders as well as the aggressors.

Earlier, my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli was challenged on the SP70. As a battlefield weapon it will be relatively useless, because it has a range of something like 19 km. As my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said, it will create havoc on both sides, besides the ultimate problem that will arise for the civilian population.

The hon. Member for Winchester is smiling. He may find that humorous, but we do not. Because we are denying our forces the conventional weapons to enable them to fight in the first-strike conventional Russian attack, we shall be placing them in jeopardy. There is no recovery from that position. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli said, when we start playing that game the stakes must then proceed to the ultimate.

We must prove the validity of our position to the British electorate over the next few months. In order to do that, we must look at the balance of conventional forces to see whether they can be funded and sustained, and what more is required to effect a balance. Therefore, we must look at the relative strengths of NATO and the Warsaw pact countries as they face the potential battlefield of Europe.

It is commonly assumed—indeed it is often asserted, as we have heard today—that the Warsaw pact has an overwhelming superiority in conventional forces in Europe. That assumption and those assertions are usually supported by unqualified numerical comparisons, such as the numbers of tanks or artillery pieces on both sides. However, if we look at the quantitative potential of both sides, a different picture will emerge of actual military capability. The evidence suggests that the assumption of a vast Warsaw pact conventional force superiority is superficial and misleading.

Every year, in the Statement on the Defence Estimates, the Government publish an assessment of the balance of conventional forces. That is known as a "bean count" approach because it is a straightforward counting of the forces and comparison with opposing systems.

However, as I have said, if one looks at the potential qualitatively, the straight number counts do not necessarily translate into an immediate picture of likely military effectiveness of the armed forces. While such comparisons are obviously useful for a quick examination of a problem, it can be argued that on issues as important as the defence of the West, more complex examinations are valid. The Government recognise that. We see on pages 58 and 59 of annex A of this year's Defence Estimates that they attempted to calculate the conventional balance. But, at the end, their view was that that was not possible; it was too complicated.

However, the Americans have had such a system since 1971. The United States defence department uses a more detailed assessment which overcomes many of the problems of a straight-count approach. The system of armoured division equivalents weighs the mobility, survivability and firepower of every weapon in every division on the central front. Although the exact numbers of ADEs on each side are classified, the ratio is not. To support our argument the figure that should be considered, rather than straight count of men, tanks or artillery pieces, is the ratio between the two forces after a qualitative assessment, and, of course, the difference is not very much.

Such an assessment leads us to the conclusion that the Warsaw pact forces cannot achieve immediate superiority in any conventional attack upon the West. Therefore, we argue that a more detailed and comprehensive assessment of the Soviet conventional threat to Western Europe would show that the balance of forces is nothing like as adverse for NATO as has been traditionally represented. From that, it is clear that the West is in a far better position to respond positively to nuclear arms control initiatives which would not mean a renunciation of security, as alleged by Conservative Members.

Labour Members maintain that the Government's defence position is untenable and misleading. The Government's assumption of the Soviet Union's advantage in the conventional force level, which constitutes a threat which is economically impossible for us to match, obviously leads them to a reliance on nuclear forces for the defence of the West. That assumption is not only open to criticism; it is wrong.

The Government's position is contradictory. On the one hand, they clamour for nuclear weapons on the basis that they are needed to counterbalance what they assert are overwhelming Soviet conventional forces. On the other hand, the Government's policy of spending more money on nuclear weaponry prevents any possibility of correcting that asserted imbalance. The Government are falling between two stools and are in danger of failing to maintain a strategic or even operational effectiveness in either area.

The Labour party's position is simple and straightforward. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli said in last year's debate, by cancelling Trident we can maintain present levels of conventional defence spending. By doing that, we can fulfil our commitments to our allies and to NATO. But above all, we can fulfil our commitments to our own service men and women in the armed forces.

8.35 pm

Mr. Neville Trotter (Tynemouth): I apologise for missing the opening speeches from the Front Benches, but my train from Newcastle was five and a half hours late.

Mr. Frank Cook: Were not they running yesterday?

Mr. Trotter: I had constituency engagements yesterday.

The hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) referred to his meeting recently with General Bernie Rogers, supreme allied commander Europe. What a pity he did not tell us General Rogers's views on the one-sided nuclear disarmament proposals of the Labour party. I find it hard to believe that that subject did not come up in that discussion.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the conventional odds against the Army in Germany being 4½:1 against an acceptable 3:1. If one works out the arithmetic, that would seem to show he is suggesting a need for a 50 per cent. increase in the Army capability in Germany. Apart from the enormous cost that that would involve, it would certainly require conscription. And, however strong the conventional forces in Germany may be, they are powerless if against them is ranged an opponent who has nuclear weapons when we have not.

I want to comment on the organisation of the Army at home and overseas. I shall talk mostly about our commitment to NATO, because in recent times most of the Army is so committed. There remains a worldwide involvenient which has been referred to by other hon. Members. The recent exercise of 5 Airborne Brigade in Oman was a great success and an example of how we can respond to a crisis that might emerge thousands of miles away.

My comment tonight on out-of-theatre forces would best be concentrated on the Falkland Islands as I was fortunate enough to be one of those hon. Members who visited the garrison there a few months ago. All the members of that party were most impressed by the long hours put in by the soldiers there. The schedule of work was six days a week, 12 hours a day—72 hours a week —a working week that reminded me of that in a Korean shipyard. Despite those long hours, morale was high. It would be wrong not to tell the House that everybody was looking forward to the time when their four months tour came to an end, but in the meantime they got on with a worthwhile job, working long hours effectively and with a high morale.

Mr. David Young (Bolton, South-East): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that nuclear weapons would not have been any use in a place such as the Falklands, and, had the Argentines waited for the Government to dispose of the carriers, they would not have been able to get the Army there in the first place because 8,000 miles is a long way to swim even for a highly trained soldier?

Mr. Trotter: There was never any question of getting rid of the carriers. No such suggestion was ever put before the House, so the hon. Gentleman's point does not arise. However, if the Argentines had developed a nuclear weapon, that could conceivably have affected the position. Certainly in the campaign that was fought, nuclear weapons played no part.

We should consider the time being spent in the Falklands by some personnel in specialist units. They are in danger of being sent there too often. That applies in particular to those involved in the port units, where the problem is that the only other port of any size that the Army mans is in Southampton water, so the men are rotated to the south much more frequently than other soldiers are. The matter should be examined.

When the new barracks are fully occupied, as they will be shortly, we shall also have to examine how best the soldiers can remain in contact with the civilian population. We were impressed on our visit by the excellent relationship between the Falkland islanders and the garrison. I am sure that hon. Members do not wish the withdrawal of the men from their present involvement in the settlements and in Port Stanley to lead to a lack of contact. I am sure that attention will be given to this matter.

I wish next to refer to the northern flank of NATO. Of course, the main part of the Army is committed to the central front in Germany but we have an important role in the north. Although the role of the Marine Brigade in Norway is well known, we are also committed to send a brigade to Denmark in an emergency. If one includes the logistic support unit, it is the largest brigade in the Army. It has 10,000 regulars and 5,000 territorials, a total of 15,000 men. Indeed, it is almost a misnaming of the force to call it a brigade. By most standards, it is of divisional strength. It includes not just infantry, armour with Chieftain tanks, gunners and engineers, as one might expect, but ports units, workshops and hospitals. It is very much a self-contained force. It is very important to the defence of the Baltic approaches. It is the major reinforcement available to the area within a few days in the event of an emergency. I am sure that in this commitment we are making a very important contribution to NATO. The Baltic approaches are a vital area that we must not overlook.

We cannot consider the organisation of the Army in Germany without referring to the role of the TA. On mobilisation, apart from their contribution to the front line, the TA provides many of the vital logistics units in the Rhine Army. The change in the disposition of I Corps, as a result of the efforts of General Sir Nigel Bagnall, when, first, he was the corps commander and then the commander of the Rhine Army, has led to a great improvement in the way in which we utilise our forces in Germany. One of our divisions is now in reserve and another division comes out from the United Kingdom to protect the rear areas. The present commander in Germany, Sir Martin Farndale, has gone on record as saying:

> "Our plan to defend our rear areas is far better than that of other allies. We are obtaining a maximum use of resources."

All credit is due to the senior officers in Germany, who have thought out and implemented this important reorganisation which has led to a far better defence than before and a far better use of the men, money and materials available.

Hon. Members will know that we have recently experimented with 6 Brigade in the air mobile role. It has been a successful experiment and much has been learnt. With the welcome decision to increase the armoured strength in Germany, with the creation of an additional tank regiment, 6 Brigade will return to its armoured role. It will thus no longer be available as an air mobile brigade. I am sure that the House will understand the advantage of the air mobile brigade. It is light, quick to move, not restricted to roads, and able to act as a plug should there be any breakthrough in the front line. It is a most important role and one that we should continue permanently.

We must consider how we can best find the men to replace the present brigade in this role. Obviously, it will need to be a United Kingdom-based brigade because we face a personnel ceiling in Germany. There is no way in which we can get any further men for this purpose out of the present strength of the Rhine Army. However, it does not need to be a large formation. It is necessarily a slimline force. It could not move itself quickly by helicopter if it had a vast tail. We are talking about perhaps 3,000 men —rather than the 15,000 to which I referred in the case of 1 Brigade committed to the defence of Denmark. I think that it should be possible for us to obtain, out of the Army's strength in this country the men necessary to form this new brigade when 6 Brigade returns to the armoured role in a couple of years.

We are seeing a complete change in thinking about the use of helicopters on the battlefield. They are increasingly being seen as fighting vehicles. It is interesting that the commander of an attack helicopter is not the pilot, any more than a tank driver is the commander.

If we want to retain a helicopter construction industry in this country, as we should, we must place regular military orders for helicopters. We cannot expect Westland to stay in business if we place orders on an intermittent basis. There must be a regular ordering programme, and we must face that fact.

I know the arguments against making decisions at this time. For one thing, it is hard to decide the size of the new troop helicopter helicopter. Personally I believe that it should not be too large. Obviously, there are advantages in carrying a large number of men at one time, but if we lose a large helicopter, we are in danger of losing a large part of an infantry battalion with it. The Special Air Service was involved in a tragic crash in the Falklands. A large part of the force was lost in one helicopter. I favour a 15-man or 16-man lift rather than a lift involving 30 men or more.

Army logistics is an enormous task in peace time, and, of course, it is even greater in war time. The Army possesses huge depots. That at Donnington contains the largest and most modern warehouse in the country. It is fully automated. The supply line goes from the depots in this country to Germany. An excellent job is done by thousands of men, many of them civilians, in this logistics system. Perhaps they do not receive enough public praise because they are not so much in the public eye, but without them the front-line units could not function. They are absolutely vital. The end of the logistics line is at the front line, to which vast quantities of ammunition, fuel, food and spares must be provided. We should pay tribute to the men involved in that side of the Army, as well as their colleagues involved in the front line infantry armour and artillery.

The Army is well equipped and in very good heart. There is, however, one piece of equipment to which I must refer. A decision must now be taken about the replacement of the Abbott self-propelled gun. It is old, too small, its shell is not powerful enough and, above all, its range is too limited. It cannot read the targets. In particular, it cannot hold off at arm's length the artillery that would be firing at it. Our gunners are the best in the world, but we are not giving them sufficiently modern equipment. The proposed replacement, the SP70, the NATO gun, has been talked about since the 1970s, hence its name. It will be the SP90 by the time it gets into service, if ever. It will certainly not be in service in the time scale that we need for our four regiments that still have Abbott. It is not a matter of money; it is a matter of having tried to make work a co-operative project within NATO. That is of course a very commendable aim.

The time has come when we should go our own way with the replacement. Vickers at Barrow has developed a gun to fulfil this role. We should now look down that line and not hold back any longer on the SP70.

I have talked about the equipment and the organisation of the Army. Above all, however, it is the personnel that give the Army its strength. If one meets the Army, whether it be in the Falklands, the United Kingdom or Germany, one cannot fail to be impressed by the young men, and indeed young women, in the units. They are well trained, well motivated, well led and well equipped. We can be proud of them. They do a great service for the country, and so do their families who so often have to live without them when they are away on detachment and exercises.

8.48 pm

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): I must register vested interests — a small one in that I served as a regular in the British Army, and was proud to do so, and a larger one in that the youngest of my brood, my son, is serving in the British Army in West Germany, not a million miles from Hanover. Of course, I cannot tell the House where he is serving because the Soviets may be listening. I am even prouder of his service because it is of more value than mine was. The Opposition are all proud of the role performed by the British service man and service woman. We have always been proud of their role because, God knows, the working classes have always supplied the majority of those who have filled that role. I offer that point as a type of defence for my comments.

Sadly, the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) has left the Chamber, but I shall comment on his speech so that he may read my points tomorrow. The hon. Gentleman was quick to comment on the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett), but he promptly forgot the contents of my hon. Friend's speech. He disregarded my hon. Friend's exhortation not to engage in debate by rubbishing arguments. My hon. Friend appealed for logic, but the hon. Member for Winchester quickly forgot that appeal when he launched into an attack by rubbishing—not my choice of word—the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). Logic was certainly missing from his criticism and his following arguments.

The hon. Member for Winchester appealed to us to respond by organising the Army in a manner similar to the Swiss. That may well be good advice, but the hon. Gentleman forgot to mention that the Swiss have no surface vessels and submarines and do not have the gamut of international responsibilities that we have. The hon. Gentleman tried to criticise by innuendo nuclear-free zones. He said that Chernobyl had proved that no such thing as a nuclear-free zone could exist. We agree, but the concept of nuclear-free zones refers to the perpetrator, not the recipient. We believe that the ideal nuclear-free zone is a nuclear-free world. Sadly, the hon. Member for Winchester has admitted his reluctance to work towards that goal.

The hon. Member for Winchester said that we needed a professional force equipped with modern integrated weapons so that we were prepared. I welcome that statement because, by making that admission, the hon. Gentleman has put himself shoulder to shoulder with the Opposition. That is exactly what we seek. How prepared are we? In late October and early November 1984, I was able to visit the NATO headquarters, the Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe and West Germany. I saw that the provision for the Army's role for defence and counter-attack was appallingly inadequate. That was the fault not of the Army but of this Government, and perhaps partly of previous Governments. This Government had let the Army down. They had not let the generals down, because they were being well catered for in terms of salary and remuneration. The Government had simply let the forces down generally.

The Tommy Atkins of our armed forces were ill-equipped. I witnessed service men of many years experience tending vehicles that were measurably older than they were. The vehicles were treacherously out of date. The men were looking after the vehicles in an examplary fashion with the most meagre resources. I saw armoured vehicles with wonderful armour and magnificent armaments—weapons that could shoot a pea off a drum at about 6,000 m, but armoured vehicles that were immobilised by inadequate, inefficient motive power units.

The hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway), who is not here either — I wonder where Conservative Members go; perhaps this is another retreat like the one from Egypt about which we heard — referred to Warsaw pact tanks that outnumber ours by 2:1. If we have tanks with inefficient, ineffective motive power units which cannot start in weather like today's, surely this gives the Warsaw pact even greater superiority. Is this not more proof—if proof were needed—that we need increased spending on conventional weapons? I learnt that some of the motive power units, which must continue to function effectively if we are to avoid cannibalisation and so reduce the number of effective components, needed spare parts. That is simple logic. Some of those spare parts could be obtained only from sources in Warsaw pact countries. In making these comparisons between the Warsaw pact and NATO, the position can become more preposterous than is worthy of comment.

These circumstances were commonplace. I am forced to remind the Minister of State that he said that the service men serve us well, and so they do. But, if we allow such a situation to exist, how well do we serve them? Why is there such a shortage of resources? Is it simply because the grotesque level of spending on nuclear weapons precludes us from putting sufficient money into conventional weapons—expenditure that is principally a mechanism of direct drainage of British economic resources straight into the copious coffers of Uncle Sam's nuclear weapons mongers—or is it neglect?

The lack of provision of conventional resources must be made good. I doubt that we would have any argument about that; hence the Labour party's policy for the redirection of the defence budget allocation from Trident schedules and the like to a programme of procurement of weapons of the very latest design in conventional terms —in fact, exactly that for which the hon. Member for Winchester called. We need to give our service men and women the tools to do the job for which they are trained and for which they are prepared to give their lives.

Do not the battlefield buffoons in the Conservative trenches realise that by depriving our troops of the most modern conventional arms they are condemning them to an early death from nuclear weapons in the Soviet strikes that would have to be made in response to our introduction of their use?

Mr. Robert Atkins: What about chemical shells?

Mr. Cook: The hon. Gentleman mentions chemical shells. The hon. Member for Winchester said that we cannot disinvent nuclear weapons. Of course we cannot, any more than we can disinvent chemical shells, poison gas, bacteriological warfare or the venereal divisions used by the Germans on the eastern front during the last war. Does the fact that we cannot disinvent them mean that we have to use them, because that is the form of logic being applied in this debate?

Mr. Atkins: Despite suggestions from the Opposition, I am not necessarily arguing that we need offensive chemical weapons. My point is that one shell in four in the Warsaw pact countries is a chemical shell, and if we have no answer to that, the threat that the Warsaw pact forces could use them is a threat that we need to think about.

Mr. Cook: I take the hon. Gentleman's point in the spirit in which he makes it, but since we know so little about our own secret services and the tricks that they get up to in this country, I am not sure that I can put much credence in secret service information emanating from Eastern bloc countries.

While I was in Germany I discussed these issues with the most senior of our staff officers, with General Sir Martin Farndale and his senior staff. I also discussed them during my visit to Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe and NATO headquarters. I should like to tell the House about one reaction to much of the discussion that went on over a number of days, sometimes into the early hours of the morning. Other ranks and non-commissioned officers were half amused but half admiring of the fact that I wore a CND badge because I am a member of the CND. I wore it in the mess and wherever I met military personnel and it served as a useful vehicle to open the subject.

I was impressed by a very senior British officer with whom I discussed matters at great length. I found him standing contemplating himself, as I thought, in a mirror but then I realised that his eyes were fixed on a point beyond the image of his own reflection and that he was deep in thought. I left him like that for a while. He said, "Frank," and I said, "Yes, Sir?" He said, "Do you remember the discussions that we had on nuclear disarmament?" I said, "Of course, I remember them vividly." He said, "I have been thinking carefully about them and I must tell you that if I were in your position I would have to adopt the same stance, because your logic holds good. Sadly, because of my position here, I suppose I shall have to put the argument into the tray marked 'Too difficult'."

When one puts that conversation alongside the constant appeals that we had from service men and women of all ranks for increased expenditure on conventional weapons — because that is the only kind of resistance that they would be able to offer to any insurgence of Soviet troops across that border — one sees the kind of dilemma with which we are faced.

Deterrence was the order of the day, so we must deprive our units of adequate supplies of the latest kit. Deterrence against what? We are told that General Rogers has threatened to withdraw about 350,000 United States troops from Europe if the Labour party comes to power and implements its policy of unilateral nuclear disarmament. That was barely reported in Britain until it was picked up almost accidentally on the American media.

[Mr. Cook]

Further, members of the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee who discussed this with us when we visited America in September last year used similar suggestions. I will not say threats; I shall call them suggestions.

That idea has been seized upon by the Conservative party in its more hysterical moments. So anxious is that party to continue to pour taxpayers' money into the purse of the American armourers, that it dispatched, without entry documents, I might add, Norman the two-wheeler to reassure his Republican cronies across the water that the Conservatives would continue to buy American weapons.

It is said that the deterrent is necessary, but what does it deter? If the argument that it is necessary holds good, is it a deterrent against Soviet aggression or against American withdrawal? The British electorate is entitled to know the answer to that one. Is not this pretence of nuclear defence merely a means of justifying the continued funding of the American war machine suppliers?

I shall conclude as I began, with two points of emphasis. The first point is the registration of pride in our service people for the job that they perform so selflessly. My second point is an appeal that we in this House at long last latch on to more logic in considering the type of equipment with which we arm our troops, men and women, when we expect them to put their lives on the line on our behalf.

9.4 pm

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): The hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) spoke of the need for logic. What was missing from his speech and that of the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) was a little arithmetic. The Labour party wants to end Britain's independent nuclear deterrent and spend the money instead on more conventional weaponry and manpower. Our nuclear weapon, Trident, is to cost some 3 per cent.—that is, about one thirtieth part — of our national defence budget. Abolition of it could lead to an increase in conventional defence expenditure of only about one thirtieth. If Britain's forces comprise about one fifteenth of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation forces, we are then talking about one thirtieth of one fifteenth. So the abandonment of Britain's deterrent could increase conventional forces for the defence of the West by roughly one thirtieth of one fifteenth, which is one four hundred and fiftieth.

The Warsaw pact, including the Soviet Union, has broadly double the conventional forces of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation. It has about 400 submarines as against our 200, about 7,000 military aircraft against our 3,000, and about 200 army divisions against about 120 on the NATO side. How can it possibly help to protect us to increase conventional forces by one four hundred and fiftieth part and abandon the protection afforded by the nuclear deterrent? That policy of the Labour party means taking a terrible risk with our security. The public know it, and I believe that it is the main reason for the fall-off in Labour support in opinion polls in the past six months.

As for the policy of the Liberal party and the Social Democrats, if by some misfortune they were to hold the balance in a hung Parliament, no one would have the slightest idea what Britain's defence policy was going to be. Last September the Liberal party conference voted to end before very long Britain's independent deterrent. The Liberal leader in a recent debate in the House listed six alternative defence policies without saying which of the six he supported. The Social Democrats do not want Trident but want Polaris, which will, in a matter of years, become out of date and not credible. The so-called alliance is deeply split from top to bottom. Its members are at sixes and sevens and their fumbling attempts to paper over the cracks deceive no one. That is why they too have fallen away sharply in the opinion polls.

A defence policy has to work. It has to protect and to deter, and it must do so credibly. It is no use going through the motions with a defence policy that is not credible. It is only the Conservative party that has a clear, honest and strong defence policy, and only the Conservative party that can keep Britain safe and free.

I turn to another Conservative cause, the long-term retention of the Royal Military School of Music at Kneller Hall, Twickenham, which trains British Army bands, whose high standards of excellence are the envy of the world. I should first thank my right hon. and hon. Friends who are or have been Defence Ministers over the past four years for their endless patience in this matter, as this is the 14th time that I have raised the subject in the House, and the third time in an Army debate. I have had 12 meetings with Ministers, one with the Prime Minister last January, one with the Secretary of State for Defence in March, two with his predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), one with my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Mr. Stanley), one four years ago with my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin), three with my noble lord, Lord Trefgarne, one with the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and two with my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman). The only Defence Minister who has dodged me so far is my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Mr. Hamilton), who is sitting on the Front Bench and, I understand, is to reply to this debate.

Although I thank the Defence Ministers for their patience, I make no apology either to them or to the House that I have been almost constantly on about this. Kneller Hall is seldom out of my thoughts. If it has become close to an obsession, that reflects the fact that I care greatly about it. It is a cause that has caught my heart and my imagination. I am fortified by the knowledge that I am not alone, because 164 of my right hon. and hon. Friends signed early-day motion 397 in 1986; those 164 included 12 of the 17 officers and executive of the 1922 Committee. I shall not read the motion to the House again because it is long, but that tremendous support from my colleagues has been echoed by support from another place where Major-General Earl Cathcart led a debate last February. Apart from Lord Trefgarne, who wound up the debate, the five peers who spoke were unanimous in their support for maintaining the status quo.

That support is echoed by the public. A total of 18,579 people have signed petitions. Those people are largely my constituents from Whitton, Twickenham, Teddington and the Hamptons, but also include a considerable number of constituents of my right hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Sir B. Hayhoe). Many of us were delighted a fortnight ago when he received an honour. His constituency boundary comes close to Kneller Hall and he has been a tower of strength in the matter. Others who signed the petition were constituents of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr.

Ground)—whose constituency is about half a mile away —and of my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley). Both my hon. Friends have strongly supported Kneller Hall.

Kneller Hall has been the home of the Royal Military School of Music in Twickenham for 129 years. The Army bands trained there lift the spirit of the nation. They represent one of our finest traditions. They enhance morale in the Army. They promote recruitment and as part of the traditional British scene they help to attract to our shores visitors whose spending generates income and employment and yields a tax revenue. The high standard of British Army bands is linked inextricably to the standards of Kneller Hall, which is doing a marvellous job in training Army bands.

Some people in the Ministry of Defence have dreamt up a scheme of improvement to merge Kneller Hall with the training of bands in other services. As the late Dr. Samuel Johnson, who frequently visited my constituency, said when he went to see Garrick at Hampton:

"most schemes of political improvement are very laughable things."

I finally ask my right hon. and hon. Friends, the Ministers in the Ministry of Defence, to note the received American wisdom, "If it ain't bust, don't fix it."

9.13 pm

Mr. David Young (Bolton, South-East): Pride in the Army has been expressed from both sides of the House, so we are not arguing about whether we are proud of those people on whom our safety depends. What we are arguing about is how they should be equipped and armed.

When opening the debate, the Minister said that his party felt that a combined conventional and nuclear response was required. Our contention is that, because the present forces on the European side are almost entirely dependent on nuclear weapons, the result will be to resort to those weapons within hours and days rather than weeks and months. That means that within a short time of a war starting, nuclear weapons will be used and escalation will be inevitable. There would then be no possibility of reaching a diplomatic solution.

I think we have all assumed too much that a war would be calculated as wars in the past have been. There is a great danger that a limited conflict may escalate into a major conflict. However, my argument applies in the other direction as well, because not all our allies in NATO have nuclear weapons. Norway and others will not have nuclear weapons on their soil. We must also remember that, since the 1950s, the British Army has been involved in limited actions in the Falklands, Cyprus, the Lebanon and Northern Ireland. The kind of training and equipment necessary for such conflicts and that required in any future actions will not rely on nuclear equipment.

In common with my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook), who spoke about a visit to Germany, I recall seeing a battalion in Cyprus that had arrived there after peacekeeping duties in the Lebanon. I remember comments from that battalion about the aged equipment with which they were required to work in Lebanon. That made me believe that the Government were not backing the men in doing their duty because a professional army requires up-to-date and professional equipment.

I also claim that defence in this age depends not only on equipment but on an economically sound nation. I do not think that Ministers can slap their backs on that count. If we are to have an independent defence, there must be an independent and updated supply industry. As we have all seen, the problem is that more and more of our contracts are dependent on United States suppliers. We must be very careful. When a contract for equipment goes to the United States, it is accompanied by the technology upon which our defence industry depends for the future.

These are the matters that concern me greatly. Much has been said of the Falklands contest. That is the kind of action in which we are likely to become involved in the future. I remind the House that at the end of the Falklands conflict some of our batteries were down to six shells. If we hold up the Falklands conflict as a glowing example, we must remember what a near-run thing it was. The outcome was not achieved by foresight; it came about more by accident and the grace of God than by the will of the Prime Minister.

We entered into the Falklands conflict when we were negotiating the sale of aircraft carriers. After the first parliamentary delegation visited the Falklands, we were de-briefed by Admiral Woodward, who told us that he could not have mounted the operation if the carriers had been sold. We must also consider the fact that, once a conflict escalates to the use of nuclear weapons, the military and civilian casualties on both sides are incalculable. The effects of dropping nuclear shells cannot be restrained.

I remember watching an operation at the Commando training centre in Norway two years ago in which a medical team was trying to deal with a man encased in a protective radiation suit. It took a team of five almost 10 minutes to cut him out of the suit. I asked the team what casualties they would expect after the first nuclear engagement and was told that there would be thousands, if not tens of thousands. In such a situation, is it not reasonable that we should argue that our contribution to NATO should be as one of a group of equals with a common purpose other than as a member of a group dominated by one partner, America, as at present? As our contribution, we should aim to ensure that the nuclear response was not the first alternative and that the brake was put on through the use of an adequate conventional force. When nuclear weapons are used, there is no point of return. We must strive to protect Britain, but we must also aim at preserving peace.

9.20 pm

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): This has been an interesting debate. Proper compliments have been paid by both sides of the House to our armed forces and, in an Army debate, compliments have been paid in particular to the Army. That is correct.

In congratulating the services, we should not overlook the fact that during the past few years there have been some incidents that do not reflect too well on the armed forces. There was a breakdown of discipline in Cyprus, which resulted in the Cyprus spy case and the Calcutt inquiry. There was also the incident in the 1st battalion of the 7th Duke of Edinburgh's Own Gurkha Rifles. It amounted almost to a mutiny and led to 110 men being dismissed. No proper explanation was given. Some of the Ministry of Defence statements and off-the-record briefings contained terrible racial overtones that were quite shocking. There was also the Royal Green Jackets incident which is now the subject of an inquiry. There have been allegations of initiation ceremonies and of serious bullying and malpractice. This should be a matter of concern to the House, because it devalues the reputation of the armed forces. The House should be given more information. The facts should not be hidden from hon. Members.

Before Christmas there was the banal announcement that the Household Cavalry was hunting deer in the New Forest. That did not go down very well with most people. Of all blood sports, hunting is the one that most people want abolished. To flout public opinion by allowing the Household Cavalry to take part in a most cruel and barbaric sport is unforgivable. The excuse was that the horses needed to be exercised. What would happen if a squaddie at the Army School of Driving at Leconfield said that he wanted to test the commanding officer's staff car by taking his girl to a disco? Would he be allowed to do so? Of course he would not. The same kind of abuse of public property took place before Christmas.

When the Prime Minister has the courage to go to the country and the Labour party forms the next Government, this practice will be stopped, and if any hunting takes place on Ministry of Defence property it will also be stopped——

Dr. Glyn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McNamara: No, I shall not. We shall stop any hunting on Ministry of Defence property until we have legislation on the statute book—[Interruption.] On all occasions when I have wound up defence debates I have allowed hon. Members to intervene and to take up time that ought to have been used by me. I have not sought to intervene in today's debate.

The hon. Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates) said that my statements about the accident to the nuclear convoy were irresponsible. If there was a degree of irresponsibility, it was shared by a great many people in this country. They fear nuclear accidents. Nobody said that there would be a nuclear explosion. Nor did I. If, however, Professor Joseph Rotblat, a member of the team that originally designed the atom bomb, says that a fire and conventional explosion could have spread the plutonium used in nuclear weapons across the countryside, that is a source of consternation, fear and worry and it is proper for hon. Members to ask questions about it. On top of that there is a fire tender in the convoy to prevent just that type of accident. The hon. Member for Hampshire, East is the one who is irresponsible by not accepting——

Mr. Mates rose——

Mr. McNamara: No, I will not give way. The hon. Gentleman made his speech and then he left the Chamber. The hon. Gentleman has come back and he will get the same treatment as I had during his speech, but I did not seek to interrupt him.

Mr. Mates rose——

Mr. McNamara: We are also aware that although the Ministry denied that there was any prospect of a nuclear leak——

Mr. Mates rose——

Mr. Robert Atkins: Give way. That was a personal attack on my hon. Friend.

Mr. McNamara: The hon. Member for Hampshire, East made a personal attack on me.

Mr. Mates rose——

Mr. McNamara: America put scientists at a satellite receiving station on a red alert to make sure that there had been no nuclear leak.

The hon. Member for Hampshire, East also said that we should not speak about such things because the Russians might not know about them, but the Russians have satellites and know all about the movement of those convoys.

The hon. Gentleman also said that I should not complain about convoys being moved about in the winter. I should like to know who planned that route. I thought that they were carefully planned, but the roads were not gritted properly and that allowed the accident to occur. I was not irresponsible. Anyone involved in such matters has the right to make such comments and ask such questions.

Mr. Mates rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. McNamara: I will now turn to the question of irresponsibility. I want to know how it was that the Queen's Own Highlanders were allowed to go to Kenya without adequate precautions to see that the men——

Mr. Mates: What a ridiculous thing to say.

Mr. McNamara: I should have thought that the possibility of the spread of AIDS among the British Army would be of concern to a former regular officer. The hon. Gentleman should be concerned about the health and safety of our men.

One is entitled to ask why adequate precautions were not taken before the men went out to Kenya. It was only when the Parachute Regiment arrived there that a decision was taken to prevent the men from going on leave at shore stations at Mombasa and elsewhere. By then the incidence of AIDS and AIDS-related deaths in that country was known as well as the fact that 65 per cent. of prostitutes in Nairobi carry the AIDS virus. It is a serious matter that should concern the House.

My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) tabled a number of questions about that today and the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security said, "I shall reply shortly." They were basic questions about who knew, when, why people were not told, and so on. All those questions could have been answered with simple straightforward replies—the facts were known.

The Under-Secretary had had a series of briefings—it is all in The Guardian—about what steps the Ministry was taking, what the Ministry had and had not thought about. We want to know who was responsible for not giving proper information to the regiment. Who was responsible for putting our troops in that risk when the facts were known?

Mr. Mates: What sort of risk?

Mr. McNamara: It is an important question for the Army and it is important to discover who was responsible.

I come to the Ministry's nasty habit of not answering questions in time or promising to answer after an awkward debate. The hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway) spoke about the DROPS contract. I do not wish to enter into any of the controversy surrounding the allocation of the contract. I am concerned about those matters that were raised by hon. Members on both sides of the House about the treatment of the managing director of that firm at the hands of the Ministry of Defence.

The Secretary of State and Lord Trefgarne said that no pressure had been brought upon the firm and that the letter from the managing director that was brandished on "Panorama" was unsolicited, despite the fact that that was denied by the managing director of the firm.

In answer to my question, the Minister who is to reply said:

"I cannot answer precisely for my noble Friend on all those questions, but I shall certainly write to the hon. Gentleman.—[Official Report, 12 December 1986; Vol. 107, c. 731.]

That was over a month ago. I waited anxiously for an answer and looked in every post. I had letters about the Royal Green Jackets and letters about this, that and the other, but nothing about that issue.

Consequently, last Thursday I tabled some questions to jog the Secretary of State's mind. I asked again whether Major-General Stopford telephoned Mr. Trafford Boughton on 30 June asking him to send a letter, whether Ministry officials were involved and whether any records were kept of telephone conversations or calls to defence contractors or potential contractors. All those questions should have been given a yes or no answer, but I was told only that the Minister would answer shortly.

Somebody is not telling the truth. The major-general, the managing director or Ministers are not telling the truth. However, Ministers are sending out letters saying that the letter on "Panorama" was completely unsolicited. The managing director, however, said that he was specifically asked and bullied for that letter.

The matter must be cleared up. It is easy for the Government to reply and it is disgraceful that hon. Members should table question after question without being given a reply.

The hon. Member for Hampshire, East also mentioned the Gurkhas and the brigade's future. I share his concern, because in 10 years' time Hong Kong will be going. I was pleased to hear that the Select Committee would be looking into the matter of the future of the Gurkha regiments. However, our imperial history has left us with some problems. After all, we owe a debt to that kingdom for the part that it has played in helping us to defend our freedom. It is an impoverished country, which depends heavily on the help that it is given in overseas aid. Although I do not like the idea of mercenary soldiers being a form of overseas aid, I must say that the relationship between the two countries is long-standing and honourable.

The problems must be faced. There is some ambiguity about the Secretary of State's answers. We do not know precisely what the Ministry means when it says that in 10 years' time things will depend on the resources available. Does that mean that British battalions may be sacrificed to maintain the Gurkhas? Alternatively, does it perhaps mean that we should keep four or five battalions of Gurkhas? What role will they play? Are we talking about an extended role in Brunei or an extended role in the United Kingdom home base? Are we thinking, perhaps, in terms of our NATO commitment? I do not know the answer, but those points must be considered.

Mr. Mates: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McNamara: No. With the greatest respect to the hon. Gentleman, I am applying the same principle. I am not being particularly nasty to him——

Mr. Mates: That is the second time that the hon. Gentleman has made a personal remark about me, and if he does not give way he will be doing me a grave discourtesy.

Mr. McNamara: Three points have been raised that deserve a proper reply from the Minister. One concerns the shortage of helicopters for the armed forces and for the Army in particular. I am only sorry that the hon. Member for Northampton——

Mr. Mates: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. That is the second time that a personal remark has been made about an hon. Member by another hon. Member who has then declined to give way. There is only a convention——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order for me. I am afraid that that happens quite frequently. The hon. Gentleman will know that if the hon. Member who is speaking does not give way, he must resume his seat.

Mr. McNamara: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

We would like a precise statement from the Minister on future requirements for support helicopters. We were promised that a decision would be made by autumn 1986 and that a statement would be made by the end of the year. We are now entering 1987 and we are still waiting. Shall we get it tonight and, if not, when?

My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) asked a question about the SP70. We are still awaiting a reply. Money is being spent on it. Is it true that we are afraid to withdraw because of any cancellation debts that might apply to us if we pulled out before the others? If that is so, the SP70 will go on costing money and not getting anywhere.

What are we doing about possible alternatives to the M109 and on the question of the AS90 with the Brazilians? The latter would seem to provide more jobs for us. Those are important matters for us.

The main burden of the debate, however, has been the question of the policies and strategies adopted by NATO. The Government have sought merely by reiteration of parrot phrases to maintain their case on that. It is a case which Labour Members, and especially my hon. Friends the Members for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) and for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook), raised to examine the entire strategy of NATO. It is true, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) said, that those doctrines are now more than 20, 30 or 40 years old. They need to be considered carefully and examined precisely. Therefore, it does no good merely to reiterate the conventional wisdom of the present time without examining whether the premises upon which those policies are based are now tenable in the light of the changes that have taken place in military strategy and weapons capability during the past 20 or 30 years.

Many Labour Members no longer believe that the Soviets have an overwhelming superiority in conventional forces which would enable them quickly to overcome western conventional forces. My hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda explained at some length the basis and reasons for considering those matters. The International Institute for Strategic Studies considered the conventional balance between the Warsaw pact and NATO. On page 225 of its strategic balance for this year it concluded:

[Mr. McNamara]

"Our conclusion remains that the conventional military balance is still such as to make general military aggression a highly risky undertaking for either side. Though possession of the initiative in war will always permit an aggressor to achieve a local advantage in numbers (sufficient perhaps to allow him to believe that he might achieve limited tactical success in some areas), there would still appear to be insufficient overall strength on either side to guarantee victory. The consequences for an attacker would still be quite unpredictable, and the risks, particularly of nuclear escalation, remain incalculable."

That is the point of the matter. Some hon. Members have spoken of the great deterrent value of the Trident system and nuclear weapons, but it was Sir John Nott, in a former incarnation as Secretary of State for Defence, who said:

"Having nuclear weapons means that we are not beholden to any tin pot dictator."

A few months later Galtieri landed in the Falklands and showed that nuclear weapons do not deter if we are not prepared to use them.

I wish to consider briefly a question that was raised. People have said that the Labour party has maintained that if we scrapped Trident the money saved could not do much for our conventional forces. The Minister said to me this morning that it would cost the Ministry of Defence £8·9 billion to maintain and provide equipment for an armoured division over 20 years. That is the figure given by the Ministry of Defence. Yet we are spending £9·9 billion on Trident over 20 years so that we would save £1 billion. That is without the running costs of £220 million a year which the Ministry has said it would cost to run Trident.

At present the Army has only 940 tanks in active service. Therefore, we could buy and operate 1,400 more. That would increase considerably the number of tanks available. Equally, we could use the money to buy 30 additional type 23 frigates and run them or we could use it for 10 new squadrons of Tornado GR1s and run them. That is clear from figures and statements from the Ministry of Defence.

The Government, whether they like it or not, must re-examine the whole basis of their defence policy. They do not have the money to maintain their present commitments. If they continue with Trident, the British Army of the Rhine will be run down in ammunition, training, weapon capability and many respects which the Minister was not prepared to mention as he tried to paint a glowing picture of these matters.

BAOR will be put at risk. If it is not capable of defending itself, it will weaken NATO and lower the nuclear threshold. Labour party policies are aimed so to strengthen our conventional forces, especially BAOR, that they will deter any would-be aggressor coming across the inner German border because they will be a strong, well-maintained and equipped, brave Army of which we all can be proud.

9.40 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Archie Hamilton): I congratulate the House on this wide-ranging debate, which has demonstrated the expertise and knowledge of the Army of many hon. Members. Several points have been raised which I shall try to answer in the short time available.

The right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) and my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) were understandably concerned about the replacement for the Abbott gun and what was happening to SP70. In 1973 the Governments of Germany, Italy and the United Kingdom signed a memorandum of understanding to develop and produce collaboratively 155 mm self-propelled howitzers to meet their requirements as then foreseen. That followed the successful introduction into service of the collaborative FH70 towed howitzer.

The programme has encountered many problems in development and the House is well aware of them. That has resulted in slippages in the original time scale. At the same time, there have been changes to long-term operational requirements. To take account of the new operating characteristics of self-propelled artillery to be able to operate effectively against threat in the next century would need further extensive development and design modifications of the existing development prototypes. That would inevitably lead to further slippage of the programme.

In view of those uncertainties, the Defence Ministers of the three partners have met to discuss the way ahead of this important collaborative programme. It was acknowledged that because of the various difficulties encountered in the project to date it was no longer possible to develop and produce a collaborative howitzer in time to meet the earlier requirements of the nations. Accordingly, it was agreed that, to meet their most pressing requirements, nations should seek their own solutions on a national basis as judged necessary.

However, Ministers reiterated their support for the objective of achieving, if possible, a collaborative solution to meet their long-term requirements in this area. Therefore, they instructed their national armament directors to continue to explore the possibilities of continued collaboration for a longer-term procurement, taking into account the decisions that were taken meanwhile on national purchases so that Ministers could decide on the best way forward in due course.

Mr. Rogers: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hamilton: I am afraid that I have a great deal to say.

The right hon. Member for Llanelli was most worried about our lack of orders for mines, and he mentioned anti-tank mines. The current in-service mine is known as Barmine and is to have its capability considerably enhanced to the whole width of a tank by the introduction of the FWAM fuses. I am pleased to be able to tell the House that the competition at sub-contract level for the production of the balance of our requirement for fuses to produce the full width attack anti-tank mine capability has just been concluded. The competition, which is worth about £28 million in all, has been won by Marconi Command and Control Systems at Hillend and the royal ordnance factory at Blackburn. Competition has yielded an estimated saving in excess of £3 million.

The right hon. Member for Llanelli and the hon. Member for Blaydon mentioned ammunition, particularly FH70 ammunition, where orders are allocated in accordance with the trilateral agreement which covers the programme.

However, the United Kingdom has a national order for the cartridge L6A1 which we expect to be placed in the near future. That does not fall under the tripartite agreement. Current FH70 ammunition orders placed in Germany are proceeding satisfactorily and there is no question of any default on the part of German industry.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Sir A. Buck) referred to the important role of the Army's military correction training centre. I am very glad to acknowledge the valuable part that he has played in the work of that centre over the years.

The hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) referred to the problems raised in the article in The Independent dealing with combat clothing. The article is inaccurate and misleading in several important aspects. That might have been avoided if the correspondent had taken advantage of the opportunity that was provided for a full briefing by the Army authorities concerned. The article referred to three items of combat clothing and I shall refer to just the first.

The introduction of flak jackets or combat body armour has not been "hit by spending restrictions." There is provision in the programme for the purchase of 138,000 items, starting in 1989, and that will be sufficient to equip all those who need special protection. However, before introducing what is an expensive item of kit, we need to be sure that it is right. That necessitates careful research on the design to ensure that it offers adequate protection and that it is not too heavy or uncomfortable for use in operational conditions. In other words, it must not impair operational performance.

The hon. Member for Woolwich also raised the question of the future location of the Army cataloguing authority. A review of defence codification is under way and the report of the study is now under consideration. The directorate of the defence codification authority is located in Glasgow—as the hon. Gentleman said—along with the naval codification staff. In the light of the study, I cannot give a categorical assurance about the location of the headquarters of the Army cataloguing authority until all our considerations are complete. I shall naturally keep the hon. Gentleman informed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates) referred to the future of the Brigade of Gurkhas with the ending of the lease in Hong Kong. We have repeatedly made it clear that there will be a continuing role for the brigade in the British Army after 1997. Its final size and shape will turn on the operational and resource factors facing the entire British Army at the time, which it is too early, at this stage, to foresee. However, we welcome the fact that the Select Committee on Defence is looking into that.

The hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) paid tribute to the Territorial Army. However, he raised the point, as did my hon. Friend for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway), about unemployment benefit. Recent efforts have been aimed at resolving the anomaly whereby an unemployed TA member, as a result of receiving a relatively small amount of pay for attendance at a drill night, loses a great amount of benefit. Ministers and officials are examining that problem and it is hoped that an announcement will be made shortly. We already operate a scheme providing an enhanced disregard for TA members who are receiving supplementary benefit.

My hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Dr. Glynn) referred to problems with the sewers at Victoria barracks. The work that is being done on the sewers has been undertaken by the Thames water authority and the local authority outside the site of the MOD development. It is not our responsibility and, indeed, we are watching its progress as closely as are the local residents. It may not be a matter that concerns the Opposition Front Bench, but I am sure that it concerns my hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) mentioned the future of the UKMF. There are no current plans to withdraw or alter the nature of that force.

My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) mentioned, as he has done before, the issue of Kneller Hall. I am happy to be the last Defence Minister to give my hon. Friend the reassurance that he is seeking. A decision will be made soon on that and my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces will be in touch with him on that.

The hon. Member for Kingston-upon-Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) raised the question of the letter which was written about DROPS by Boughton. The difficulty was that if Boughton participated in the "Panorama" programme or otherwise influenced criticism about its elimination from DROPS, the only way in which we could respond in public to explain our position was to spell out its shortcomings in public.

We did not wish to do that if it could be avoided. It was for that reason alone that General Stopford was instructed to ascertain directly from Mr. Boughton his attitude and involvement in the television programme. My noble Friend the Minister of State was not involved because he had no need to be. Mr. Boughton volunteered the fact that he wished to have no part in it. It is noteworthy that he has not, as far as I am aware, complained directly to the MOD about it even when invited by my noble Friend in November to comment on any aspects. I am not aware of any reported evidence of the conversation. However, I know that it accords exactly with the line volunteered on a separate occasion at the British Army equipment exhibition to the Chief of Defence Procurement and Brigadier Last. [Interruption.] We do not accept that we have acted improperly in any way towards Boughton and we reject all allegations of intimidation.

Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I think that I heard the word "lie". I hope that I did not.

Mr. MacNamara: I was saying that the statement that was in the letter was a lie and that the letter had been solicited. I was not saying that the Minister was telling a lie. I am grateful to the Minister for his explanation. I wish only that he had answered my questions.

Mr. Hamilton: I was hoping that we had cleared up this difficulty.

Although we have considered the role of the Army in the nation's defence in general, the House is well aware that our principal task is to fulfil our commitment to NATO. If deterrence fails and war comes again to Europe, that means that BAOR will be fighting in Germany.

We have every reason to be proud of the professionalism and dedication of our soldiers and we can be confident that they have the will and the equipment to withstand a conventional attack from the forces of the Warsaw pact—for a time.

However, we have to accept that the Soviet Union and its allies have an overwhelming superiority of numbers in both men and equipment. However brave our men, however deadly their bullets and missiles, the conventional superiority of the Warsaw pact forces could well prove decisive. The NATO allies would do well to hold out against a major sustained attack.

How is it then that we have managed to deter the Soviet Union from war? As the House knows, since 1967 NATO has had a policy known as flexible response which does not rule out the use of nuclear weapons if conventional defence is seen to be failing. Such use could, of itself, halt the advance of Warsaw pact countries, but it would also be a powerful signal to the Soviet Union that it was running the risk of escalation and, ultimately, an unacceptable degree of damage.

The Soviets know that and realise the great dangers of undertaking any military adventure in Europe which could lead, ultimately, to a war from which neither side could possibly emerge victorious. That is at the heart of the theory and practice of deterrence and it has worked since 1945.

The Labour party seeks to change NATO's nuclear policy, the policy which keeps the peace in Europe. Labour seeks to render unprotected our troops, and those of our American allies, by removing their nuclear weapons. Surely the nub of the argument is the fact that even the best equipped and most highly trained armies of the world are defenceless if their enemy has nuclear weapons and they do not.

Mr. Mikhail Gorbachev—or at least his generals—must be living in the fervent hope of a Labour victory at the next election in this country. If Labour wins, Britain will disarm unilaterally while the strategic and theatre nuclear arsenals of the Soviet Union will remain virtually intact, even if the Kremlin makes the meaningless gesture of matching our disarmament missile for missile.

Not only has the Labour party adopted a policy which will strip our troops in this way, and which promises the abandonment of the national strategic guarantee, which every British Government since the war has thought necessary, but it threatens the NATO alliance in a way in which the Soviet Union could never do.

Labour's proposals to close American nuclear bases in the United Kingdom would destabilise NATO and encourage that minority of Americans who say that the United States has no business defending Europe anyway. A number of senior Americans believe that the effect on NATO would be absolutely catastrophic. I can say only that it is fortunate that the British people will never let it be put to the test.

It is well known that many in the United States are growing increasingly frustrated at what they see as Europe's lack of commitment to defend itself. A refusal by the United Kingdom to share the burden in Europe will only increase the strength of the American lobby which argues for United States' withdrawal.

Labour politicians are keen to reassure themselves that Europe must remain America's front line. However, it does not need a great leap of imagination to foresee their policies encouraging a minority in the United States to press for American defence policy to be confined to the shores of the United States, and for Europe to assume the role of being no more than another buffer zone.

It is no good the Opposition saying that savings on Trident would be spent on conventional arms to make up the difference. This was referred to by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Colchester, North and my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham. What that money will buy will not make up the difference. At most, it may buy two armoured divisions—about 300 tanks. At the same time, the Warsaw pact already has about 30,000 more tanks than NATO, of which 25,000 are to be found in eastern Europe. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State described earlier the increasing capability of the Warsaw pact. What would deter the occupants of the Kremlin more — Trident or another 300 tanks in a British corps which had no tactical nuclear weapons to respond to theirs? Such improvement in our conventional capability is no deterrent. It might delay the moment of reckoning; it certainly would not affect the outcome.

Let us examine the claim from the Opposition that all the savings on Trident would be spent on conventional defence. Am I alone in finding that claim almost incredible? When one considers Labour's commitment to increase public expenditure by £28 billion a year, are we really expected to believe that a Labour Government will continue to maintain level funding on defence despite the difficulties that they will meet in fulfilling their commitments to spend massively in other areas of the public sector?

NATO cannot afford to have an expensive and protracted conventional war fought over its territory. It has been NATO's nuclear capacity that has deterred our enemies and prevented a third world war, another conventional war in Europe.

The Leader of the Opposition said that NATO's defence policy rests on increasingly untenable assumptions. They are not untenable assumptions, but unpalatable facts for any potential aggressor. It is his assumptions which are untenable, not ours or NATO's.

The right hon. Gentleman has said that he is not prepared for his country to die for him. I have no idea what that was supposed to mean, and I suspect that he has not either, but it sounded rather good and that was probably enough for him.

The reality is that Europe without nuclear weapons brings the possibility of war closer as the continent becomes safer for conventional warfare. The likelihood of millions of Britons dying for the right hon. Gentleman becomes through his policies greater rather than less.

The truth is that the Labour party cannot admit the real choice that it offers over defence policy. That choice is either collective security as a member of a defensive alliance which relies on nuclear weapons as the final guarantee, or isolated neutralism.

No other state in NATO rejects the nuclear element of the Alliance's policies, because our allies can see that we are all faced by a nuclear threat.

There are many Opposition Members who would like to see the Labour party adopt not some but all of CND's policies—we have heard from one or two of them this evening—by breaking with our NATO allies and going down the neutralist road. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) is proud of being a member of CND. If he is a member of CND, presumably he wants to follow its policies, and there are many other such members of the Labour party. I cannot see how the hon. Gentleman can be a member of CND without wanting to see its policies followed through.

The Labour party will find that it is unrepresentative of the British people on the issue of defence as it is on so many others.

Britons have fought in two world wars in Europe and have no wish to be drawn into another. They realise that unilateral disarmament makes a third world war more likely, not less. That is why they will reject the Opposition's defence policy at the next election and support the Government's well-tried principles which have given us peace in Europe since 1945.

Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd (Lords Commissioner to the Treasury): I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I shall put together the three motions in the name of the hon. Member for Shipley (Sir M. Fox).

Ordered,

That Mr. Eric Forth be discharged from the Employment Committee and Mr. Warren Hawksley be added to the Committee. [Sir Marcus Fox, on behalf of the Committee of Selection].

Ordered,

That Mr. Michael Stern be discharged from the Environment Committee and Mr. Jonathan Sayeed be added to the Committee. [Sir Marcus Fox, on behalf of the Committee of Selection].

Ordered,

That Mr. Tony Favell be discharged from the Social Services Committee and Mr. Patrick McLoughlin be added to the Committee. [Sir Marcus Fox, on behalf of the Committee of Selection].

British Coal (House Sales)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

10 pm

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity of an Adjournment debate to raise the important and pressing problem of the houses that are currently being sold by British Coal.

Since 1976, British Coal has sold 70,000 of its houses to owner-occupiers at advantageous rates, and that has gone satisfactorily. However, nearly 20,000 houses are now left, which, in the main, are inhabited by elderly tenants, widows and so on, many of them pensioners who have served a lifetime in the mines, who are too old to take on a mortgage and who have no wish to be saddled with a mortgage at their time of life.

In addition, many of the houses are unfit and would not obtain a mortgage from a building society because of structural problems. In Nottinghamshire, where my constituency is, there are 4,200 such houses. In my constituency alone, there are 1,026. Of the two district councils that cover my constituency, Bassetlaw has 723 and Mansfield has 883. About 325 of the Nottinghamshire houses are defective and would have great problems in attracting a mortgage from anywhere.

So far, British Coal has pursued a policy of putting such houses up for auction and it intends to put some out to tender. The way that that policy has been carried out has caused a great deal of discontent. Many of the houses being sold wholesale in that way have fetched prices as low as £3,000. In a recent auction at the Kensington Hilton on 11 December, 149 properties in Wakefield were sold for an average price of £3,600. Fifty-five houses were categorised as having defects under the Housing Defects Act 1984. There were 55 in Staffordshire Moorlands which realised £235,000, and, at the Connaught Rooms, 151 properties fetched £618,000. In other words, an approximate price of less than £4,000 was paid per house.

Obviously, when such prices have been arrived at at auctions, property speculators everywhere have pricked up their ears and descend en masse for what looks like a good bargain. There has been strong criticism of the way in which British Coal has sold those houses, not just from hon. Members but from no less a body than the National Housing and Town Planning Council. In its magazine the council said that tenants are given just three months to make one of the most important and difficult decisions of their lives. Notification of the timetable for disposal within a local authority area was far too short and some British Coal areas are even refusing the common courtesy of telling the local authorities when the houses are coming up for sale.

Some houses were recently sold in my constituency and the local council found out only as a result of a small advert in the local weekly giveaway newspaper three days before the auction took place. There is strong criticism by the National Housing and Town Planning Council to the effect that the assessment of the purchasers' credibility and suitability as a landlord is not being taken into account by British Coal when literally anyone, no matter what his track record as a landlord, can buy them. Because British Coal insists on selling many houses at auction, controls over who buys them are impossible.

[Mr. Joseph Ashton]

There is also strong criticism about the availability of the names of the landlords. British Coal claims that the purchasers' names is a matter of commercial confidentiality. But surely it should not be selling to people unwilling to register their name publicly. The new landlord and tenant legislation which will go through Parliament this Session with all-party support is trying to stop such practices. British Coal should at least be made to operate to those standards.

It is in the interests of former British Coal tenants that the House and the Department should find some ways and means to help them. Speculators who are suspected of living in Athens have bought the houses. One firm called the Rare Carpet Company in Chelsea has put in bids for them. In places such as Creswell, houses were bought by a speculator for £3,000. Within six months, he had doubled the price and sold them to another speculator for £6,000. In many cases, it is impossible for tenants to have repairs done. Some houses were bought in Aston, in the constituency of the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), and no rents were collected for 10 weeks. It is a Greek solicitor who collects the rent.

It appears that, in many areas, speculators are simply moving in to set up a modern form of Rachmanism. They buy these houses wholesale. They know that they are tenanted by elderly people and expect them to be empty within two or three years, in which case they will get as much as £18,000 for them. Of course, if the houses have to be pulled down because they are defective, the new buyers will have the land, and they will easily get planning permission to build on it.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): Is my hon. Friend aware that, at the 11 December auction at the Kensington Hilton, some houses were sold for £2,600? Previously, the occupiers, aged miners, had been offered them for £3,600. Within days of the auction, the new owners knocked on those people's doors and offered them at £3,600, with a £1,000 profit in two to three days.

Mr. Ashton: My hon. Friend is right. I went to a meeting of the Tenants Federation in Mansfield last Saturday. It is trying to form a nationwide federation of tenants of British Coal houses because of what is happening. People go around knocking on doors of elderly people at 10.30 pm. They ask who lives in the house, how old they are, what their state of health is and what repairs need to be done. Forms have been sent. The Overseas Commodities Group attaches a £1 coin with a piece of sellotape to the bottom of the form. The form asks:

"Why was the freehold not bought when it was offered by the Coal Board? Is the house in good repair? Does it need electric wiring? How many people live there?

Obviously, those questions are asked with the intention of making a quick profit and a quick killing.

Not all the houses are defective. In Meden Vale, in my constituency, some were built in 1963. Because of the pressure applied by Members of Parliament, the auctions that were due to take place next week of 400 houses in Thurnscoe in Yorkshire and about 25 houses in Warsop in my constituency have been postponed by the Coal Board, but only for a month, so that we may have this debate. Because the House was in recess, we managed to apply some pressure to postpone the auctions.

Because British Coal must dispose of all these houses, the remaining 20,000 must go by September 1988. Many think that this is a prelude to possible privatisation if the Tories win the next election. When we met the British Coal board leaders Sir Robert Haslam and Mr. Kenneth Cousins, the reaction we received was unsympathetic. They simply said that they are in the business of selling coal, not renting houses. Frankly, their attitude to many of their employees, who worked 30 or 40 years in the pits, who coughed up their lungs, and who travelled down from Newcastle and Durham and Scotland when the pits shut, to work in Nottingham, was deplorable.

Tenants federations have been formed. As my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) said, when he went to that auction, the sellers were scared of demonstrations outside the auctions, driving down the prices. In many cases, the Coal Board was worried about demonstrations.

There is a simple answer to the problem of absentee landlords not doing repairs and of tenants not being properly looked after. It is to allow councils to buy the houses. For instance, in my constituency, both Bassetlaw and Mansfield councils wish to buy these houses. It is not just a matter of doing repairs on the houses. Many of them are next to slag heaps. The environments are poor and need to be landscaped. Weeds are growing out of the gutters. The pavements need proper attention. They are derelict areas. They are beginning to decline into a state of decay and disrepair. When an absentee landlord owns many houses in a street, it is difficult to get this sort of work done.

Bassetlaw and Mansfield councils have said that they are willing to buy these houses at a fair price. It is much cheaper to buy a house at £6,000 than to build a new council house at £20,000. It is common sense for the councils to buy the houses, because they will get their money back in rent in two or three years. That is why the speculators want these houses. Fair rents of £17.40 a week have beeen set on some. The tenants are being charged £15, so the speculators will immediately increase the rent by £2.40. My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) has said that, in Elsecar in his constituency, the speculators' first action was to knock on the door and ask for £100 before starting on any improvements.

This serious problem affects nearly 20,000 houses. What stops councils from buying these British Coal houses? It is not cash. Bassetlaw council gained £6 million from selling off council houses, as the Government forced it to do. Mansfield council gained £5 million from receipts of council house sales. Those councils are willing to use that money, but the Government will not let them do so. The Government's arbitrary, dogmatic attitude is not to allow councils to use the cash from council house sales.

That is pretty stupid, but even more stupid is the fact that the law in Scotland is different. Scottish councils can use and are using that cash to buy the British Coal's houses. East Lothian council is actively negotiating to buy 130 British Coal houses. The funding comes from the authority's capital allocation. The negotiations are not subject to Scottish Office approval. I do not want to bore the House, but the facts and figures which the Library has given me should be put on the record. The Library's letter states:

"local authorities . . . cannot contain general borrowing approval for the Municipalisation. Circular 9/85 Capital programmes—Annex A issued in March 1985—gives the types of activity which receive block borrowing approval; municipalisation is excluded without the consent of the Secretary of State".

That is what the Adjournment debate is all about. We are asking the Under-Secretary of State to bring English local authorities into line with Scottish local authorities. That can be done. The letter states:

"A large number of housing authorities in England therefore could buy NCB houses since most authorities are no longer receiving housing subsidy."

These houses could be bought by using the capital allowance. The Library's letter continues:

"This presupposes, of course, that the local authorities have sufficient capital receipts to meet the cost of purchase, and that they have not already allocated the prescribed proportion (generally 20 per cent.) which they are allowed to spend in addition to their HIP allocation."

We are asking for the other 80 per cent. to be spent. We want English local authorities to have the same financial allocation that exists in Scotland to give them a chance to buy these housing estates.

I do not know whether the Under-Secretary of State has ever been in a mining area in the north of England. I do not wish to be derogatory, but this shows one of the problems that we have with Conservative Ministers. If the hon. Gentleman has been to that region, he would know that in many areas the metal struts of many houses have rotted and need massive attention. These houses are fetching about £2,500 at auction. The councils admit that in some cases £14,000 is needed to repair them. The Government have made such sums available where tenants have bought houses from the Coal Board. In the past, when councils have bought houses which have been found to be defective, the Government have come up with grants to rectify the problems. The councils are not asking for those grants; they are asking only to be allowed to use their money, just as councils in East Lothian and other parts of Scotland can. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will say that the Secretary of State will allow that to happen.

10.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Richard Tracey): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) for raising this important subject. It is good to see the number of hon. Members on both sides of the House who are showing a keen interest in it. I fully appreciate the anxieties felt in coalfield communities. He has described them, but I can also tell him, and his hon. Friends will confirm, that I went to look at these houese some time ago with members of the Coalfield Communities Campaign, who conducted me on a very full tour. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy for his presence this evening. I know that he shares my interest and wishes to see the best possible outcome for all parties in this matter.

Before I go on to discuss the problems mentioned by the hon. Gentleman and by hon. Members on previous occasions, and the scope that there is for action on these issues, it is necessary for me to sketch in the historical background to the sale of British Coal housing so that we can get a better perspective of what is happening. The National Coal Board became a landlord on vesting day, 1 January 1947. It inherited a stock of 140,000 houses from the Coal Owners whose assets were taken into public ownership. Much of that housing was old and not in a good state of repair. Some of it was subsequently cleared. In the 1950s and the 1960s the National Coal Board, now known as British Coal, built 24,000 more houses under the aegis of the Coal Industry Housing Association, which was subsequently wound up. Some of the total stock of housing was sold to local authorities and some to the sitting tenants at a discount of 25 per cent. progressively over this period. By 1976 the board had disposed of 78,000 houses and a further 86,000 remained in its ownership.

The board decided to withdraw from the provision of housing in 1976, and thought that the disposal of its houses would take 10 years. Tenants were offered 50 per cent. discounts, 100 per cent mortgages and help with legal fees. By 1985 the board had 27,000 houses left, and it decided to complete the sale of these houses in three years. The terms were that tenants be given three months in which to decide whether they were interested in buying. We must remember that the option had been open to them since 1976. If they decided not to buy, the properties were to be sold to local authorities and housing associations. Failing that, they would be released on the open market.

To date, 69 per cent. of British Coal's stock of houses, the vast majority, have been sold to the tenants and a further 20 per cent. to local authorities and housing associations. The expectation is that the majority of the remaining 15,700 houses will be sold to sitting tenants, local authorities and housing associations — not necessarily in the same proportions. Therefore, the number of houses that will remain to be sold to private landlords will be very small, particularly when seen in relation to the enormous numbers of houses that were once owned by the board. The vast majority of the sales have been successful and untroubled by complications.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): I am grateful to the Minister for allowing me to intervene on this point about the sale of houses, because in my constituency, in Alton in Leeds, there is an estate of 210 houses that were owned by British Coal. These were sold last year. I should like to quote from a letter that I received from the chairman of the housing committee in Leeds, Councillor Bill Kilgallon. The letter says:

"The Airey form of construction, and likely long-term remedial costs associated with these, appears to have frightened off some of the speculators, although it now seems that a London property firm, Manchester Square Associates, are the purchasers . . . Officers have met managing agents for this organisation but their long-term intentions are not known, apart from the site having been offered for sale, by them, in recent weeks."

In other words, there is a knock-on effect for the tenants of the houses. The estate is deteriorating and there is no specified programme for what is to happen to it. That is the situation that confronts the tenants on the estates in these areas. Would the Minister take that on board and try to do something to stop this kind of Rachmanism that we find in the sale of British Coal houses?

Mr. Tracey: The hon. Member will know that I always take careful note of points like that which are made to me, and I certainly undertake to look into what he has said. I repeat that the vast majority of the sales have been successful and untroubled by complications. This evening we are talking about a small minority of houses. Nevertheless the points raised by the hon. Member and by his hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) will be taken into account by us.

I understand that the board built over 6,000 of the prefabricated reinforced concrete houses, known as PRC houses for short. They are now designated under the housing defects legislation. Over two thirds were sold to sitting tenants before it was known that they were of a defective type, and many of these will be entitled to assistance from their local authority under those provisions, provided that they bought before the cut-off date for their type of house. British Coal has been given no financial assistance to deal with its remaining PRC houses and does not believe that its tenants should take on the potentially heavy liability of defective housing.

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): I am delighted to hear the Minister undertaking to look at all the points raised by Opposition Members. I can only speak as I find. I have been dealing with this problem for 12 months. British Coal has been co-operative, has given me a moratorium on any PRC houses, has allowed my tenants time to explore all the avenues for buying.

Two years ago, if a local authority or a housing association were to buy, British Coal allowed a 30 per cent. discount. That has gone. I would like the Minister to look into this to see whether his Department can reintroduce it. We have to have a policy on PRC houses because some day they will have to be repaired. It is no good bucking the issue now when we know for certain that the taxpayer will have to pick up the bill later on.

Mr. Tracey: I can certainly confirm what my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) said. I can confirm that he has been in touch with British Coal on behalf of his constituents, and has had considerable success. British Coal has said that it will not sell these PRC houses to its tenants and it has for the moment suspended auctions on this sort of house, but I shall be saying later that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy and colleagues from that Department and from the Department of the Environment will be seeing British Coal and will take these further points to it. I would point out that only 700 PRC houses remain to be sold. That is all. That is a very small proportion of the total of 15,000 houses from the British Coal estates which remain to be sold.

Although it is a public body, British Coal has, of course, been a very large private landlord. Its tenants are protected by the Rent Acts. It has decided it does not wish to be a landlord any longer, and this is consistent with the Government's policy generally on the disposal of public sector houses and land. This decision, and decisions on the way it chooses to withdraw from the rental market, have been entirely the responsibility of British Coal's management.

At the same time it, and any body to whom it may sell its properties are bound by the Rent Acts and the Landlord and Tenants Acts with certain inescapable obligations prescribed by that legislation. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment can no more dictate British Coal's policies than he can any other landlord's. He can offer assistance or advice if it is wanted; it would not be proper for him to intervene. Hon. Members of course fully realise that.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Why can they not do that in Scotland?

Mr. Tracey: I shall deal with Scotland in a moment.

My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy and I are indeed alive to the problems that are alleged to have been occurring and are preparing to discuss them with the management of British Coal. Our two Departments are in contact on the issues and share a common concern that we should reach the best solution for the tenants compatible with the Government's objectives that British Coal should reach break-even by 1988-89.

I think it would be helpful if I say a few words about some of the problems raised this evening by the hon. Member for Bassetlaw. It has been alleged that some of the houses sold at auction have then been resold quickly, and that the tenants do not know who their new landlord is. I must say quite clearly that tenants have a legal right to know who their landlord is. [HON. MEMBERS: "Tell them."] I am telling the House that now. That is a fact. A new landlord must inform tenants of his name and address when he acquires the property. The tenant may ask for if from the agent or person who collects the rent, and the agent must supply it within 21 days. The agent or landlord may be fined up to £2,000 for failing to meet these requirements. I am prepared to tell the House that I believe that it is deplorable if landlords or their agents are breaking the law in this respect.

It has also been alleged that the new landlords are failing to tell tenants what their rent is when they take over the property, demanding large arrears payments and then initiating possession proceedings against tenants who fail to pay. The tenants, I make it quite clear, are protected by the Rent Acts under their new landlords as they were under British Coal. They are entitled to have fair rents registered for their property. They are entitled to a rent book if they pay their rent weekly. They do not have to pay anything more than the fair rent, and a new landlord cannot charge them an additional sum on top or take them to court for failing to pay it. A landlord cannot evict a tenant without going through the proper processes of the law. A tenant in arrears may be taken to court, but the court will award possession to the landlord only if it thinks it is reasonable to do so. If landlords are breaking the law, I deplore it. I cannot say this too strongly. I hope this debate will bring the tenants' rights to the attention of such landlords and, if any have failed in their statutory duties, that they set about complying with the law as soon as possible.

I believe the hon. Member's own authority has bought some British Coal houses at auction out of its capital receipts. I do not feel in general that this is the best use of resources, but it may have made sense to the authority in this particular case. There are restrictions on the amount of capital receipts that local authorities can use in any one year because the use of those receipts for capital spending does affect the public sector borrowing requirement. Capital receipts which are not spent immediately are mostly used to reduce borrowing; they diminish public borrowing in the year in which they arise, but must be replaced by fresh borrowings when they come to be used for capital spending. I remind the House that the external debt of English local authorities is already about £30 billion. We are not depriving authorities of their receipts, but simply requiring their use to be spread over time.

On the point made by the hon. Member about Scottish authorities, they are buying British Coal houses with their capital receipts. I must say that the Scottish capital control system in important respects is different from the English system. Although Scottish authorities are free to use the full amount of capital receipts arising in a year they cannot carry forward unused capital receipts to future years. To change to this system would disadvantage English authorities who can of course carry forward unused capital receipts. I do not think English authorities would want the Scottish system.
